A Commissioner of Pensions is merely a sworn agent to administer existing law. He did not make it. He can not unmake it. He dare not pervert it. He is not an almsgiver. He is not an administrator of self-determined charities. The difficulties of his place are manifold, and however faithfully and zealously he administers the law he is the most continuously censured and abused of all American officials. An examination of facts set forth in the excellent recent annual report made by Hon. H. C. Evans, the Commissioner of Pensions, will disclose things worth the attention of Congress and the people.

Excluding from the present consideration those who have become entitled to pensions under the general laws by reason of service in the recent war with Spain, pensions are given, as already stated, for participance in the Revolutionary war, the war of 1812, the Indian wars from 1832 to 1842, the Mexican war, and the war for the Union. For all but the war for the Union pensions are given for service. For fourteen days' service in the war of 1812, for sixty days' service in the Mexican war, the soldier or the soldier's widow receives a pension. Since 1871, 61,187 of these soldiers and soldiers' widows' pensions have been granted on account of the war of 1812, and often for the most trivial and ineffective services. Since 1887, 31,717 of these service pensions have been granted to soldiers and widows of the war with Mexico, and often for a trivial and futile service. That makes 93,000 service pensions granted in recent years, in full view and knowledge of the soldiers and their widows of the war for the Union, the most tremendous war service of modern times, where the service and the stress of camp and hospital, of march and battle, was for more than four years, and not a soldier or a soldier's widow or a soldier's child can get one dollar of pension because of the soldier's service as service in that war. This has filled every community in America with rankling discontents and invested the helpless Commissioner of Pensions in an atmosphere of resentments. It is not he; it is the Congress of the United States that is at fault by adopting a wrong principle as to pensions or refusing to apply universally and impartially a right one.

Service pensions are either right for all or right for none. They are either right for soldiers of the Union or wrong for the soldiers of other wars. The American people like justice, equality, and fair play, and they do not think and I do not think, that it meets the requirements of just, fair, and impartial government for Congress to give service pensions for a little brief, make-believe part in such mere simulations of war as the skirmishes of 1812 and petty Indian wars, and withhold it from the service of the men whose heroism saved the very life of this nation in the greatest storm of war the world ever saw. Do not misunderstand me; I do not ask and Union soldiers do not ask and the American people do not ask service pensions for the Union soldiers, but only fair play and impartial treatment by their Government and lawmakers. One hundred thousand pensioners put recently upon the nation's pay roll, which the Union soldiers and the rest of the American people have to pay, because of some shadowy service in 1812 or 1832 or 1846, upon some principle of war legislation which Congress does not apply to the soldiers of the Union, makes a flagrancy and enormity in the perversion of all just and fair policies of government which others may defend, but which I will not. But it is an enormity in legislation which has rightly pervaded the American people with discontent.

I presume every member of this House has read in Gibbon and Ferguson, in Liddell and Mommsen, or other writers who reproduce their knowledge, how in the squalid days of expiring Rome foolish demagogues bought a short tenure of place by bribing the pretorian guards at their own price, without considering the people, who in the end keep governments in their place as God's laws keep the planets. The American people are sound and staid and safe. Go out among them and you will find they want no pension bribe to preserve this Republic. They only demand fair play, equal rights, and justice. If any have played the demagogue, if any have assumed that either soldiery or people in America had come to be like the mercenary pretorian guard of expiring Rome that put their government up for sale for pay for pension, I commend them to a radical change of their opinions. The American people have not got to that stress yet. All they want is equal and exact justice. If Congress had resisted improper legislation, if it had stood out against the pension-claim agents of Washington, it would find it could now be appropriating ten or twenty million dollars for pensions with far more general contentment than is now given by its use of $148,765,971.26 as its outlay for pensions in the last fiscal year.

That great sum published to the world as spent on pensions last year quickens all the passions that corrupt mankind and destroy governments. The American soldiery, as well as the American people—and I do not think the one should be considered without the other—were perfectly content that in 1871, six years after the war ended and when all the pensionable cases on account of death, wounds, disease, or war disability were all in, the amount paid for pensions should begin to decrease as it did from the war maximum. The law as to pensions was known to every soldier who enlisted in the Union Army, if he cared to know. Most of them did not and never made pensions a thought or factor in their contracts in enlistment. The soldiers and the people were perfectly content that in 1873 pensions should decline two and one-half million dollars from their war maximum. They all thought every American should go about making his living in his own way, greatly helped, as every survivor was greatly helped, by the pay he got as a Union soldier. No able-bodied soldier thought then he had any contract or moral or patriotic right to anything more than his monthly pay or the pension to his widow and orphan children if he was killed. At the close of the war for the Union no able-bodied soldier would any more have applied for a pension than he would have applied for maintenance in the county poorhouse.

The soldiers of the Union recognized this as the end of the war. No one of them was an applicant for pension except the wounded or disabled or the families of the killed in war. It is the Congress of the United States, influenced by false views and the stress of claim agents, that has depraved and corrupted the people away from that sturdy, honest, American view. If the Government owes a pension to anyone it should pay that pension without allowing one dollar to any claim agent or permitting any claim agent to commit any spoliation of the Government claimant. Yet the Government is being undermined, the lawful administration of the Pension Office thwarted, the course of justice perverted, public opinion misled, and pension claimants continuously bunkoed by corrupt and greedy claim agents, who write to pensioners false and misleading statements that the claimant can win illicit gains outside of the law and outside of the honest administration of the Pension Department. The claim agent tells the claimant that the Senator or Congressman can by his personal influence make the Commissioner of Pensions violate the law in the claimant's case or else pass a special law through Congress giving him more than the general law allows. And Congress has so far yielded to this unjust, partial, corrupting policy, undermining the Government, that since 1867 it has passed 6,097 special pension acts overriding its own pension laws, impeaching the Commissioner of Pensions in public confidence, making caprice instead of uniform law the basis of pension legislation, giving Congressional sanction to inequality and injustice in the giving of pensions, yielding the National Treasury up to individual greed, and corrupting the Government in its foundations. The making by Congress of a special pension, overriding and displacing its general law as to pensions, is a corrupting and degenerate influence.

How can the Commissioner of Pensions maintain himself; how can the law be maintained as an equity for all; how can the people be persuaded they are treated to equal rights before the law when, with a half million Americans pleading their claims before the Commissioner of Pensions, Congress takes two to three hundred haphazard cases in each session and grants pensions outside of principle, upon the sheerest caprice, upon grounds no one can account for, and wholly outside of the nation's law and outside of what Congress has given the Commissioner of Pensions liberty to do? Twelve months hence is Congress going to give a special pension to a native Filipino or a native Porto Rican by act of Congress, while a half million American citizens who, by staking their lives saved the life of this nation, are waiting at the Pension Bureau for the adjudication of their claims according to law? Congress should make general pension laws, dealing impartially and fairly with all of the like service, and it should pass no special acts—no acts of favoritism whatever. Let us keep to the spirit of Jefferson and Jackson and Lincoln; or rather and better let us keep the Constitution and do equal justice to all the people alike.

The special pension bills passed by Congress are too few to be a public benefit, but numerous enough to be a public menace—378 in the Fifty-fourth Congress; 119 in the Fifty-third; 217 in the Fifty-second; 1,388 in the Fifty-first; 12 in the Thirty-seventh.

The board of review of the Pension Office really passes upon and adjudicates pension claims, and it is governed by the general pension laws made by Congress. In the last fiscal year that board admitted 95,760 claims and rejected 85,629; a total of 181,389. The board had to return 51,676 claims for further examination as incomplete; making a total of claims reviewed by the board 233,065. There are multitudes of Americans who think these cases, the examination of which is a year's labor of more than 1,800 officials in the Pension Bureau, are all personally examined by the Commissioner of Pensions, and that his action upon them depends not upon the law but upon his personal caprice or inclination, according as he is sympathetic or unsympathetic with the Union soldier. The 85,629 rejected claimants and the 51,676 delayed claimants, who have stated upon oath that their claims are just, feel like King Lear, "mightily abused." That is a great multitude of the citizenship, a great army of the discontented, to make in one year because the existing law and the desires of pension claimants are at cross purposes.

The action of the Pension Bureau and the Commissioner is not final. There is an appeal to the Secretary of the Interior. There was 12,057 of these appeals in the last year—all by the attorneys of the pension claimants. Not one appeal was taken by the Government. There are already nine considerable volumes of published opinions in the appealed cases.

The appeal and the special act of Congress are a double method of inspiring the whole body of pensioners with discontent and distrust of the Commissioner and the Pension Bureau, while increasing greatly the work and burden of the latter.

The method of examination of claimants by local medical boards is most productive of discontent among pension claimants. The report of Commissioner Evans shows an illustrative case where a claimant was sent in immediate succession before four medical boards. One reported no ratable or pensionable disability; the second board, an $8 disability; the third, a $17 rate; the fourth, a $24 rate; and all four reports reached the Pension Bureau within the same forty-eight hours.

In 1878 General Garfield said, as is well known, that the amount paid for pensions would thenceforth steadily decline. The amount paid that year for soldier pensions was $26,251,725. Four years before it was $29,603,159. There were then 223,998 pensioners on the rolls and the year before 232,104. The last fiscal year there were 993,714 on the rolls and the amounts paid more than $148,000,000. There were 37,524 new applications for pension filed in the last year. There were 52,648 allowed. Since 1862 to the close of the last fiscal year there were 2,222,940 pension claims filed with the Pension Bureau. Remember there is no service pension for the war for the Union. The only grounds for pensions so far allowed by law as to this is death, wound, or disability while in the war, or by the act of 1890 a twelve-dollar or smaller monthly rate for an ex-soldier who can not work.

I doubt if any other part of all the vast outlay of the Government annually for its various purposes diffuses so many benefits, does so much general, communal, and individual good as what is paid for pensions.

But that is not the question. Along with those benefits, accompanying that good, goes the great evil that an unequal, crude, raw, ill-devised pension system dealing unwisely and partially is pervading the people with discontent, causing anger to the very beneficiaries of the nation's bounty, corrupting the public conscience, enfeebling the moral sense at once of the people and their lawmakers, sapping the principles of good government and the essentials of individual and communal well-being at their foundations, making vast masses of the people dissatisfied with their public officials, and making it difficult, if not impossible, for those officials to faithfully do their duty according to the law and their oaths.

We should not think of starting this Government out upon what may be distinctively a policy of militarism; at least involving an increase of our Army and composing it in large part of the natives of islands heretofore foreign to us, we should not do this without revising and reconstituting our pension system.

The time is opportune. For many years the nation's lawmaker from the North did not dare do his will as to pensions for one reason. The lawmaker from the South did not dare do it for another reason. Thank God that is past. Now the nation and the Congress have no spectral and divided hands reaching from the graves of the past, holding the lawmakers of North or South, of this party or that, back from unitedly, harmoniously, and together doing what is best and safest as to pensions for the good solely of the whole united American people and of their one chosen Republic.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to have read an amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. Is this to be read for the information of the committee, or does the gentleman desire to offer it now as an amendment?

Mr. BERRY. I ask that it be read for information.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by adding at the end of section 4 as follows:

"There shall be a board consisting of five members to be appointed by the President, four of whom shall be Regular Army officers and graduates of the West Point Military Academy, and the fifth shall be a medical officer, before which board every appointee to a commissioned office made since the declaration of war against Spain, or who may be appointed hereafter under the provisions of this bill, said board shall fix a standard not less than that required for admission to the second class at the academy at West Point. No one shall remain a commissioned officer of the Army appointed since the war with Spain or to be hereafter appointed thereto who shall not in such examination receive at least 2.50 mark on a maximum of 4 as now adopted by said West Point Academy. This provision shall not apply to any officer who has distinguished himself by heroic conduct in the war with Spain."

The CHAIRMAN. This amendment has been read for the information of the committee.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. Chairman, the object of the amendment——

Mr. HULL. Allow me to suggest that this amendment would come in better on section 5.

Mr. BERRY. I am afraid we shall never reach section 5 the way we are going on.

Mr. HULL. I hope we shall get there in ten minutes.

Mr. BERRY. Then I will address myself more particularly to the bill itself, which seems to me, and so far as I could learn from the discussion, and I have listened to this debate on both sides, to have no particular paternity. When I look at the RECORD I find the chief participants in this debate and the members of the Military Committee all to be quite young men, who could not have been soldiers during the late civil war, and probably did not originate this bill; and the military department has been very much occupied with embalmed beef. Neither the Secretary of War nor the Adjutant-General nor the General Commanding have had military educations. I should like to find out who originated this bill for the reorganization of the Army. Nobody has acknowledged its paternity yet.

So far as I am concerned, I am for the retention of every foot of territory—as that question seems to have been dragged into this discussion—I am for the retention of every foot of territory that has been acquired by this war with Spain [applause]; and I am in favor of just as much force as may be necessary to vindicate the American Government inside of that territory. But I want to say right here that I never want the Philippines to be represented on the floor of Congress or to be a State of the National Government to which I belong.

Mr. MAGUIRE. What do you want them to be?

Mr. BERRY. I want them to be under the control of the United States and protected, as we said in regard to Cuba at the inception of the war, until they are able to take care of themselves, with an independent government of their own choosing. [Applause.] But I do not want to place in the hands of the President of the United States or any other man such power as some gentlemen on this floor seem willing to confer. I do not blame the President very much for what I am about to speak of, because he has been importuned by all sorts of people, and he has a great many things to demand his attention and has to satisfy many importunities. But I have here a long list, which I propose to publish in the RECORD, of fathers and grandfathers and cousins and aunts who have had their particular friends appointed as officers in the service.

I regret it is not more complete. In the future, if the Army is to be increased, I want the poor young men who have no Senators or Representatives for fathers or special influence to have an opportunity to be admitted into the Army of the United States on real merit and capacity. [Applause.] And that is the object of the amendment which I have had read. Why, sir, I took to the Adjutant-General of the Army the name of an expert in his line in this country—Albert Silva; and the Adjutant-General had years before from personal knowledge said that this man was one of the best he had ever seen in the commissary department and the Government needed just such men. Yet I could not secure an appointment, perhaps because I was an humble Congressman. But if some distinguished Senator or member of the Military Committee goes up to the Department and asks the appointment of a young man who knows nothing about the issuing of rations, that young man obtains a place without any difficulty. I want to remedy that condition of things, so that every poor young man in America, whether from Kentucky or any other section of the Union, shall have the same opportunity for securing a place in the Army that every other man has.

I want to say, as a Democrat, that when the United States Government sent its peace commissioners to Paris—a nonpartisan commission, being composed in part of Democrats—that commission agreed that this country would take the Philippine Islands, and the treaty will and should be confirmed; we have taken them; and I say that it is now as much the duty of the United States to protect the Philippines against such men as Aguinaldo and such adventurers as it was the duty of the United States to protect the Cubans against the outrages of the Spanish Government. [Applause.] And whenever a condition of peace is restored in the Philippines, I shall be ready to say to whoever may be the constituted authorities chosen by the people of those islands, "Take them and control them, but let them be in sympathy with the United States, that our trade may expand in that direction and that encouragement may be given to the industries of America."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I understand that there are four minutes of the time remaining on this paragraph and the amendment, and that the time belongs to the members on this side of the House who are in favor of this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman is correct.

Mr. HULL. Now, I wish to say in reference to the——

A MEMBER. Why not give the other side a chance?

Mr. HULL (continuing). I desire to say that I sympathize fully with the remarks of my friend from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] who has just taken his seat, and I have no doubt that we can prepare a bill so as to give to all parties and to every individual an equal, reasonable, and proper chance. But I wish to say a few words especially as to the paternity of this bill, which has been called in question here.

Mr. LACEY. I hope the gentleman will talk of the pending amendment, which is the principal point now. We can come to the paternity of the bill later.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I have a word to say only in the few moments remaining. It will be impossible to go over the features that have already been considered; but I wish to suggest that this amendment deals with reference to the infantry as has already been done with reference to the cavalry, as to making a minimum for the company.

Mr. BERRY. Are you willing that the President shall designate——

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa yield?

Mr. HULL. No; I can not yield in the short time at my command.

There has been some talk as to the paternity of the bill; and I wanted to say a word on my own behalf in that regard. The gentleman from Tennessee was anxious to have some one ask a question in reference to it this morning. I am perfectly willing that a question shall be asked, or any question, so that full information shall be given.

It is only necessary to say, Mr. Chairman, that in the preparation of this bill I was anxious to have the very best information that was attainable for my benefit and for the use of Congress. I called upon the experts at the War Department, men who have been engaged in this business, and asked their views and opinions. We wanted expert opinions only—of men who had served in the cavalry, the infantry, and artillery. I had the benefit of the knowledge and experience of General Schwan, a general officer of the Army in the recent war, a man who enlisted as a private soldier, afterwards became second lieutenant and then first lieutenant, and afterwards captain, and served, I think, for thirty-one years as a commissioned officer. He has been on staff only a few years. I have also the benefit of the knowledge of Major Heistand, who served for nineteen years in the infantry and for one year on the staff of the Army; the help of Major Simpson, who served twenty-three years in the line as an artillery officer and one year on the staff.

Then I also had the benefit of the experience of Major Johnston, who served in the cavalry for more than nineteen years and one year on the staff. I tried to get full information, as far as it was available, from the very best sources, and have given to the House all of the information that was accessible to us. I spent time here before Congress convened, and am satisfied with the work.

Mr. BERRY. Do you not think that the men who have had a military education, and who have seen services under such circumstances, are stronger and better qualified to give testimony than those who were appointed from civil life?

Mr. HULL. Undoubtedly.

These men are competent to determine the various questions that are necessarily presented in a bill of this character; and let me say that no man is able to prepare a bill of this kind, covering all of its details, without accepting assistance and information from others who are experienced and who have had information with reference to the questions presented. It requires a man who has served in the line, in the ranks, and on the staff for a series of years to master all the details.

The question is a large one, and covers an enormous field, and requires an immense amount of information and consideration. And while we may here undertake to discuss all of the sections and features of the bill and guard, in the main, all of the provisions which the bill presents, yet, as a matter of fact, we are compelled to rely for technical matters on the training of those who have had experience, and I am glad they have been so competent to help Congress find a fair solution of the problem, so that the country may have an organization which insures an efficient Army.

The CHAIRMAN. The time fixed for debate upon this paragraph and all amendments has expired.

The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH].

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

Mr. HAY. I give notice that I will ask a separate vote of the House on that proposition.

The Clerk read section 5 of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 5. That all vacancies created or caused by the provisions of this act above the grade of captain in the line of the Army shall be filled by promotion according to seniority in the several arms. To equalize promotions in the lower grades, the lieutenants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry in service on the date of the passage of this act shall be placed on one list, according to relative rank. There shall then be selected for promotion, according to seniority, a sufficient number of them to fill the vacancies in the grade of captain in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry. When thus selected, they shall be commissioned, as far as practicable, in the arm to which they belonged as lieutenants. The lieutenants remaining after the vacancies in the grade of captain shall have been filled shall be distributed proportionately in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry, and shall be assigned, as far as practicable, to the several arms to which they belonged at the time of the passage of this act; and thereafter they shall be promoted as now provided for by law.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting a new section 5, instead of the section embodied in the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 5. That all vacancies created or caused by the provisions of this act, above the grade of captain in the line of the Army, shall be filled by promotion, according to seniority, in the several arms. To equalize promotion to captaincies, the lieutenants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry in the service on the date of the passage of this act shall be placed on one list, according to rank as determined by length of service as commissioned officers: Provided, That in cases where such officers have the same length of service as commissioned officers they shall take rank, according to their relative rank on entry into the service, as commissioned officers: And further provided, That graduates of the Military Academy of the same date shall be arranged according to class standing on graduation; and that officers occupying an anomalous position, by reason of voluntary transfer or sentence of court-martial, shall remain in the arm to which they now belong, with the relative rank resulting from such transfer or sentence.

There shall be then selected for promotion, according to seniority as above established, a sufficient number of them to fill the vacancies in the grade of captain in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry. When thus selected, they shall be commissioned as far as practicable in the arm to which they belonged as lieutenants. The lieutenants remaining, after all vacancies in the grade of captain in the cavalry, artillery, and infantry shall have been filled, shall remain in the arm to which they belonged, and with the relative rank they held previous to the passage of this act: Provided, That if the provisions of this section should leave second lieutenants remaining in any arm of the line while there are vacancies in the grade of first lieutenant in one or both of the other arms, such remaining second lieutenants may be commissioned as first lieutenants in the arm or arms in which there are such vacancies, and with rank according to the rule above provided for promotion to captaincies: And provided further, That when any vacancies shall exist in the rank of second lieutenant in any arm of the service the same shall be filled by the President; first, from the graduates of West Point not previously assigned; second, by the promotion of qualified noncommissioned officers already in that arm of the service, and one annually from each military school which has a special course of military instruction, if vacancies exist; third, from distinguished graduates of colleges and military schools, where Army officers are or have been assigned to duty as instructors, and from like graduates of such colleges as have a course in or give military instructions.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am not sure but that is subject to a point of order.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING].

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

Mr. DOCKERY. I should like to reserve a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING] offers an amendment to the amendment, which the Clerk will report.

Insert after the word "law" the following:
"Provided, That officers to be transferred to the cavalry and artillery shall be required to pass a special examination as to their fitness and qualifications for such assignment."

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, on behalf of a majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, I will say that there is no objection to that latter amendment. In support of the amendment which I submitted as a substitute for the entire section, I send up the following letter from the War Department, that it may be read from the desk by the Clerk.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, before that is read, may I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. GRIFFIN. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. Is this proviso as to the examination of certain officers intended to dispense with the examination which is now required for every man in the case of lieutenants who are to be promoted to captaincies in this bill, or are they still to be required to pass the examination for the upper grades?

Mr. GRIFFIN. In answer to the question of the gentleman from Ohio, I will say that this applies specially, particularly, and only to officers who are transferred from one arm of the service to the other; for instance, from the infantry to the cavalry or the artillery.

Mr. BROMWELL. Yes; but you do not answer my question.

Mr. GRIFFIN. It does not dispense with the examination of officers in being promoted; not at all. Now, Mr. Chairman, I wait for the reading of that letter.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the letter.

The Clerk read as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT, ADJUTANT-GENERAL'S OFFICE,
Washington, January 21, 1899.

DEAR MR. HULL: Some fault has been found with section 5 of the Hull bill, from the fact that lieutenants of infantry, having had unusual promotion during the past year, would, if they were transferred to another arm, have undue rank in that arm. I send you herewith a proposed amendment, the result of much thought. It is believed to be as just and fair as any provision that could be made. The effect of it would be to give any officer transferred to another arm exactly the position he would have occupied in that arm had he gone into it on his original entry into the service.

The special provision about the graduates of the Military Academy is put in because in some cases graduates came into one arm as additional second lieutenants, their full second lieutenancies bearing a later date, thus coming below men in other arms originally their juniors.

You will observe that this letter and the amendment of section 5 it proposes supersedes my letter to you of December 12, together with a substitute therein proposed for section 5 of H. R. 11022, as agreed to by your committee and reported to the House.

I send these papers by special messenger, as I now understand you intend to have certain proposed amendments to the bill printed. That our latest amendment of section 5 (the one herewith) embodies a just and workable scheme, Major Simpson and I will endeavor to explain to you Monday morning.

Very respectfully,
THEO. SCHWAN,
Assistant Adjutant-General.

Hon. JOHN A. T. HULL,
Chairman Committee on Military Affairs,
House of Representatives.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Mr. Chairman, if there is any one branch of this bill which might or might not, according to its provisions, do justice to the various lines of the Army as applicable to commissioned officers, it is this provision. If there is any one subject connected with Army reorganization which ought to be so adjusted as to deal justly and fairly with every officer in the Army, and with those who are approaching the condition of being commissioned officers, it is this section.

From the time the bill was first formulated up to the time when we began the consideration of this measure, much was heard on all sides in the way of advice and suggestion from experts in the line of the Army; and out of the line of the Army, from civilians and from Representatives on this floor, as to the necessity of fixing in this reorganization a rule of promotion which would deal justly by all. This amendment is submitted, in view of those appeals, in order to have a just and fair rule of promotion. The amendment was prepared on those lines, and the committee believe that it is the best proposition that can be submitted on the subject.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Chairman, I only want to say a word. This section of the Hull bill, as originally drawn, did not equalize promotions. The substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GRIFFIN] is one which, had he not offered it, I should have offered. It does equalize promotions. It is satisfactory to every branch of the service, as I understand it, and, with the amendment to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. LOVERING], will obviate any criticism that an infantryman transferred to the artillery is not competent to perform the duties of an artilleryman, because the amendment to the amendment requires him to pass a technical examination, and in every way this substitute, as I understand it, is perfectly satisfactory not only to the line of the Army, but to the staff, who drew the original bill.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer some comments upon this bill now before the House. But in the short time allotted under the five-minute rule it is impossible to go over the ground to my own satisfaction. I ask the privilege of having some rather extended remarks printed in the RECORD. I am aware that I have the right by vote of the committee to do this, but as these remarks are somewhat lengthy, and include suggestions that have been submitted to me, I ask special permission to do so.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that he may extend his remarks in the RECORD. Is there objection?

Mr. HULL. My understanding is that he has that right absolutely.

Mr. DOCKERY. He has the right already.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman says he so understands, but he desires special consent of the committee. There seems to be no objection, and the gentleman has that privilege.

Mr. LOVERING. Mr. Chairman, section 3 of the Hull bill, favorably reported to the House December 20, 1898, with amendments, provides for a corps organization for the artillery, but the amendments strike out some of the most valuable features—inspector-general of artillery, etc.

Section 5 provides that to equalize promotions in the lower grades on account of the increase in the several arms the lieutenants of cavalry, artillery, and infantry shall be placed on one list according to relative rank and promoted to captain according to seniority, etc. The report of the committee gives as a reason for this that promotions in the cavalry arm, on account of the increase in the Army, would not be as great as in the other arms. It would seem proper, however, to take into account the superior training demanded for the artillery, and require that in this promotion the officers to be assigned to the artillery, particularly from other arms, should be required to pass a special examination. The Committee on Military Affairs, in its report, dwells on the special qualities required for artillery, but seems to overlook this point in this section of the bill. Many appointments from civil life were recently made in the artillery without taking this into account.

Section 6 introduces very desirable requirements, that officers appointed into the Adjutant-General's Department should pass a special examination.

The same is true of section 7 in reference to the Inspector-General's Department.

In section 8, referring to the Judge-Advocate-General's Department (this is the name of the present department. The McClellan bill calls it the Judge-Advocate's Department, the Miles bill the Bureau of Military Justice), this provision is entirely omitted. It would seem proper that appointment in this department should demand some method of determining legal qualifications of appointees, admission to the bar, or even admission to practice before the United States courts; and this whether they are appointed from the Army or from civil life. It seems desirable that judge-advocates should have had some military training also, since often important questions relating not only to military but to civil law are referred to the Judge-Advocate's Department. It is practically the legal adviser of the War Department.

In sections 9 and 10, referring to the Quartermaster's Department and the Subsistence Department, the examination as to qualifications for appointment is entirely omitted, and it is provided that persons from the Volunteer Army or from civil life can be appointed without any other examination than as to their physical fitness. In the recent war it has been apparent that one great source of difficulty in the administration of these two departments was the intermingling of untrained and inexperienced men with those in the department, the new men often outranking regular officers of the corps and depending upon them for their own information.

It was generally considered among Army men that these corps in particular needed to be filled by men of some military training and practical experience. As now constituted "promotion" from one grade to another up to a major in these corps is made on examination, although "appointments" in the lowest grade are made simply by selection without examination. This bill provides for appointments, even to the rank of major, without examination as to qualifications. Instead of breaking down the barrier to promotion in these corps, it seems desirable rather to require special examination for appointments as well as promotions, even if the appointment is confined entirely to Regular Army officers. It can not be assumed that every officer in the Army will make a good quartermaster or commissary, and appointments from outside the Army should be made only after a thorough and special investigation regarding fitness for the position.

In section 11, referring to the Medical Department, provision is made for the appointment of 100 dentists. It would seem almost as important to provide for the appointment of 100 chiropodists, since the care of the feet is specially important for the soldier and very few surgeons or physicians seem to pay special attention to this subject in connection with the foot gear. It is to be remembered, however, in organizing a corps with two or more sets of officers, that they are very likely in time to be consolidated into one list for promotion. This has previously occurred in the Medical Department in the grade of medical purveyor, and officers so graded before permanent consolidation entered the corps with a higher grade than they would otherwise have reached. A similar condition arose at one time in the Corps of Engineers when a separate corps of topographical engineers was consolidated with it.

Section 12, relating to the Pay Department, demands only examination into the physical fitness. It seems important that there should be some definite method prescribed for determining an appointee's business capacity and fitness for handling funds. While great responsibility may not often rest on the lower grades of this corps, its officers are often called upon to settle very important questions relating to money affairs. Some knowledge of military conditions is also advisable.

Section 13 refers to the Corps of Engineers. If there is any criticism to be made regarding the present methods of appointment into this corps, it would be that the officers enter it with no other military experience than the West Point training, and that there is nothing to insure their coming into immediate contact and dealings with the line of the Army, especially in the lower grades.

The present method of appointment in the Ordnance Department, which is still continued in section 14 of the bill, secures this preliminary experience and has worked most satisfactorily. It not only insures a preliminary military schooling, but a continuation of scientific study after entrance into the Army and before appointment into the corps. Section 13 proposes to remove, in regard to appointment into the engineers, even the present assurance of some military training. If the chief object of an engineer corps of the Army is to provide officers for civil works, to which they are so extensively assigned at present; it would be of greater importance to introduce engineers from civil life; but it is to be remembered that the main object of the military establishment is to conduct military work, and all the officers of this corps are liable to be called on for works of military engineering. The principal advantage to be gained by introduction of engineers from civil life would be that this would subject them to restrictions of a system the thoroughness of which is the secret of the confidence imposed in this corps. The tendency of the work of the Engineer Corps is even now to draw its officers more and more away from touch with Army work, as indicated in the following statement by the General of the Army:

> Under the present law governing the Army, cadets in the Military Academy who graduate highest in their class are assigned to the Engineer Corps and are ordered to report to the senior officers of the corps for duty in connection with the improvement of rivers and harbors—a civil engineer's work—so that in case of war after the lapse of a number of years, those bright young officers are liable to become totally unfitted for the duties of their profession, in a military sense, and for which they were educated at the Military Academy.

Section 13 of the McClellan bill is a practical reproduction of section 13 of the Hull bill, relating to the Corps of Engineers.

Sections 16, 17, 18, and 19 of the Miles bill, relating to the Corps of Engineers, do not attempt to correct the difficulty pointed out by General Miles and referred to in above notes on section 13 of the Hull bill.

The standing at West Point grades students according to a fair promise for the future, but does not allow for the development often noticeable in practical life after an academic course nor for the stagnation often seen in those whose faculties have been overstrained to attain schoolboy success. The final graduation standing at the Naval Academy is not determined until two years of service have passed after the academic course is completed.

Section 20, corresponding to section 21 of the McClellan bill, to the effect that "nothing in this act shall operate to cause the discharge from the service of the United States of any commissioned officer now in the Army," is obscure from not defining whether it refers to officers of volunteers as well as officers of regulars.

MILES BILL ESPECIALLY DETAILS TO THE STAFF.

In section 9, referring to the Adjutant-General's Department and to positions to be filled by details from the Army, there is some obscurity as to the meaning of "original vacancies." It is not clear whether the intention is that the higher grades should be filled, as far as possible, by promotion of the regular officers of the corps, or whether the numbers added by the bill to each grade should be filled by detail, and the promotion of the regular officers confined to vacancies which may occur in the present membership of the corps.

Section 10 properly provides, as does section 7 of the Hull bill, for examination before appointment into the Inspector-General's Department.

Section 11, regarding the "Bureau of Military Justice" (Judge-Advocate-General's Department), omits, as does section 8 of the Hull bill, all reference to determination of legal qualifications of appointees.

In sections 12 and 13, relative to the Quartermaster's and Subsistence Department, there is the same obscurity as that noted with reference to the Adjutant-General's Department in section 9.

In section 14, regarding the Ordnance Department, the recognized advantage of the present method of appointment seems to be overlooked.

Section 22, relating to appointments, gives a very indefinite indication of the system to be followed.

Section 23, which allows arbitrary transfers from any branch of the Army to any other, annuls all the previous restrictions in the bill.

This bill provides for a slight increase in the number of cadets at the Military Academy; the Proctor bill for a still greater increase.

The most important feature of the Miles bill, as shown in various paragraphs, is that relating to the detail of officers for various staff duties, in place of having regularly established staff corps. Under proper restrictions, and with a suitable control of the Army, there is much to be said in favor of such a method. As compared with the present system of arbitrarily appointing officers to permanent and life-long positions in such corps without careful scrutiny into their capacity, not only for the important duties of the lower grades to which they are appointed, but of the higher grades, to which they may rapidly succeed, the system of temporary appointment by which the capacity of officers could be tested, allowing officers to be relieved from such positions if they are not suited to them, would be superior in some respects.

While, however, under the present system of appointment permanent positions are often obtained under mere personal or political pressure, the proposed system, unless modified by restrictions which do not appear in the bill, would allow still greater room for the exercise of such personal or political influence, and would make an efficient administration of the Army wholly dependent on the power of the military authorities to resist pressure of those who do not have the efficiency of the Army at heart, or at best do not appreciate the conditions on which that efficiency depends. Under a military government like that of Germany such selection can be safely left to the authorities, because the military power controls the Government, and the efficiency of the army is of the first importance. Controlled as our Government is by changing Administrations with varying policies, the importance of making and keeping the Army a strictly military body is often lost from sight by those in power, who forget that even to be of full value to the civil power, to which it is and should be ever subordinated in this country, the Army should be like the Navy, a thoroughly organized machine, capable of carrying out without fail the military duties for which it is intended.

The country has just seen the disastrous extent to which such a system of arbitrary details and appointments can be carried when the laws do not provide proper restrictions for its exercise. In the temporary organization growing out of the war with Spain not only have officers often been rapidly advanced from subordinate positions in the Regular Army to greatly increased rank in the volunteers and placed above their superiors in rank in the Regular Army, without reference to the comparative abilities of these officers, and even without consultation with their military superiors, but civilians, with little and often with no military experience, have been placed in high positions in the staff and in the line, where efficient and experienced officers were subjected to service under them. There is nothing in the Miles bill to prevent a recurrence of many of these conditions, even in the regular establishment. While many of the early sections of the bill seem to provide some safeguard for certain corps, section 23 seems to sweep them all aside and reduce the bill practically to this: "Anyone once appointed into the Army can be arbitrarily assigned to any department and can be promoted in it or in any other department which would give him the most rapid advancement." If a system of details is to govern, while the final authority for ordering the details must rest with the Secretary of War or the President, the efficiency of the Army can be protected only by requiring that such details or transfers, at least below the rank of general, should not be made without the recommendation of the strictly military head of the Army or of some properly constituted military board or council.

It is hardly possible to estimate the serious blow given to military morale among the officers of the Army during the past year by the total disregard of all the established principles which they have been trained and required to follow and on which they have been taught to rely. Under cover of a law hurriedly planned and passed the Regular Army was merged into a great force, in which all principles of advancement for the service and merit have been violated, and in the very emergency for which officers had been preparing by years of patient service and hard study they were practically told that this was to count for naught. Of the heart-burning rage and despair so caused full estimate can not be made. Bad as this state of affairs has been for the temporary conditions of the emergency, its perpetuation by making these temporary inequalities permanent, broadly and without even the restriction to cases of conspicuous gallantry and ability, will do lasting injury to the service, making dependence on influence the rule, rather than the confidence which has inspired and held together our little Army and made it effective, that faithful service would bring its fair reward. Already this new spirit has spread far and wide, and from low to high the opinion is fully expressed that merit counts for nothing. But just here are the regular soldiers also at a disadvantage, being by their duties far from home usually quite removed from touch with powerful influence, while respect for their profession, too, has led many of the most deserving to avoid using even what influence they could command.

After the long and arduous duties of the civil war, where new men were molded into armies by campaigns and battles which drew out all their soldierly capabilities, it was right and proper that officers so trained should pass into the permanent establishment, and that many should even enter it with high rank commensurate with that held in the volunteers; but it will be found that even then a large proportion of those now left in service, many who had served as colonels and had the brevets of generals, entered the Regular Army with the rank of company officers, often with the rank of second lieutenant. It is not only the men of West Point training, but such as the above who have worked their way up from the lower grades, who are now to be affected and smothered by an influx of comparatively raw men, and are to see the staff positions before open to them filled by men of inferior capacity.

It is even proposed in the Hull bill that this be done by selection for mere physical capacity. One of the most efficient regimental quartermasters of the Volunteer Army—the present governor of Minnesota—would fail in this test.

Even after the civil war there were many inequalities resulting from the reorganization, but this was inevitable when the small Regular Army at the beginning of that war was but a drop in the immense force called into being, and when the war was of a nature to throw doubt and distrust on the loyalty of many who were in that small Army.

There is grave doubt whether the country should maintain at great expense a military academy and a regular army for the training of officers and soldiers if the product of these theoretical and practical schools is to be belittled and the trained men thereby produced left unused and humiliated when the very emergency arises for which they are needed. While it is right and proper that officers should enter the lowest grades from the ranks and from civil life, as now provided for by law, and especially from among those who have volunteered in the late war, it is, for future safety of the Army administration, criminal to so flood even those positions and not provide for supplying a fair proportion of men especially trained by the United States military school or colleges where serious military instruction is given. Too many examples are even now arising of the lowering of the soldierly standing by the lack of such an element among those who have risen by natural promotion to the grades demanding the highest degree of military training. Though it can not be expected that all graduates of the Military Academy will rise to or even prove capable of high command, it is nevertheless especially in the higher grades that thoroughness of early training in military science and tradition, when combined with experience, most tells to advantage in the organization, discipline, and administration of an army, as well as in directing its movements.

THE PROCTOR BILL.

This, like the Miles bill, provides for the detail of officers for staff duties, and, like it, omits all provision for regulating such details. It has some advantage in reference to the promotion of present officers of the staff corps.

The criticisms that have been made on present and past methods of appointment to staff corps are not to be interpreted as a reflection upon the present personnel of these corps. It would be safer to trust to those who are familiar with the duties as they are, and to work the change gradually, than to attempt to upset and wholly disturb the organization.

While it is evident that the experiences of the past year have not been a fair test of most the regularly organized staff corps, because of the admixture of inexperienced men in various grades, it does not appear that any one of them, saving, perhaps, the Medical Corps, though controlled by officers who had military experience during the civil war, had even evolved from the lessons of that war a scheme for expansion to be applied in the emergency demanding it.

That they should have been unprepared goes without saying, for the actual preparation depended on Congress, which had been for years indifferent. Possibly all prearranged plans would have been rendered futile by the disorganization introduced by hurried legislation, and the resulting laws, which have had the same effect as if devised more with reference to distributing patronage than to promoting the efficiency of the Army. It by no means follows that promotion to a majorate or even to a colonelcy during the civil war, in the great armies to which a regiment was a smaller unit than was a company in the Regular Army at the beginning of the Spanish war, made a man a general, or even made him capable of appreciating and directing military operations to the full.

The officers of the staff corps, from knowledge of our unprepared conditions, well and ably pictured by many officers during many years past, and of the almost certainty that no well-digested laws would be passed in an emergency, might well have been discouraged from working out schemes which would be swept away by a breath.

M'CLELLAN BILL.

Section 6 provides for the creation of a general staff, but does not sufficiently define its duties and authority. It defeats the very purpose of a general staff by arbitrarily assigning to it special officers, instead of having it made up of specially selected and trained officers wherever they can be found.

Section 7, relative to the Judge-Advocate's Department, makes no provision for legal qualifications, but this may be covered sufficiently by section 19, providing for examination of all appointments in staff corps.

Section 12, relating to the Engineer Corps, is practically the same as section 13 of the Hull bill.

Section 13 arranges for the transfer of the Ordnance Department to the Corps of Artillery. The officers of ordnance are now rated as mounted officers. This transfer would reduce the pay of present officers below the rank of major. The general advantages and disadvantages of this consolidation will be noted later on.

Section 14, transferring the officers of the Signal Department to the infantry, makes no provision for the present head of the corps and would reduce the present pay of captains and lieutenants now rated as mounted officers.

Section 15 creates a new department, called the equipment department, the object of which is not clearly shown.

Section 18 wisely provides for an age limit to appointments of second lieutenants, as does the same section of the Hull bill. It would be of advantage to add a limit of age for appointment to each grade. This has been adopted in the English service to produce a healthy flow of promotion.

This bill contains the desirable feature of assimilated rank instead of actual military rank for those departments which are not strictly of a military nature requiring a high degree of military training. This is in accordance with conditions in the Navy.

Section 19 wisely limits appointments in the staff corps, after examination, to officers who have served five years in the Army, and throws open positions in the staff to officers of any branch of the Army.

Section 19 of the Hull bill contains the latter provision without the limitation provided in the McClellan bill.

"GENERAL STAFF."

The most important feature of the McClellan bill is the provision in section 6 for the creation of a general staff. Few military men will deny the advantage of having a general staff organization if it can be adapted to the peculiar conditions of our service, some of which have been mentioned in discussing the system of details proposed by the Miles bill. In the first place, the constitution of such a body should be entirely free from personal and political control. It should have at its head a man of recognized capacity, familiar with all the branches of the military profession, and the officers under him should be drawn from all parts of the Army, whether of the staff or of the line, after a thorough investigation into their capacities for the varied and special duties that would devolve on such a corps.

Such assignment should not, as a rule, depend upon relative rank of officers to be selected. There is very little doubt that the efficiency of the Army will be greatly increased by having, for the staff corps at least, a central military control of recognized ability and authority—a "clearing-house," so to speak—to insure the mutual action of the different bureaus in harmony and for the greatest efficiency. The tendency in the different bureaus is to grow toward complete independence of each other, controlled only by the nonmilitary head of the War Department; since the Adjutant-General's Department, through which such questions pass to and from the Secretary of War, is not by law officered or organized for deciding, if even for advising upon them. Examples may be cited of such difficulties.

The transportation of ordnance, commissary, and medical supplies, as well as of the supplies of its own department, depends upon the Quartermaster's Department. Each separate department naturally urges precedence in the forwarding of its own supplies, and the question of deciding often has to rest on officers of the transportation department who may not understand the relative importance. Even in time of peace different policies are pursued by different departments regarding the same thing, and there is no one whose duty it is to note and accommodate such differences. While for years the Engineer's Department, under civil-service appropriations, in improving the navigation of the Mississippi River was incidentally lowering the level at a point just above Rock Island Arsenal, the Ordnance Department, under military appropriations, was using every effort to secure and maintain proper head of water in the water-power pool supplied from this same point in the river.

It is doubtful whether the McClellan bill insures such composition of the general staff as would meet the needs of the Army. Section 6 provides for the consolidation of the present Adjutant-General's and the Inspector-General's Department for this purpose, and the organization of the present Inspector-General's Department may be classed with the Adjutant-General's Department as discussed above with respect to adaptation to such an important rôle.

By the accidents of service, the rôle not intended for it has been practically forced upon the Adjutant-General's Department, so that from being merely the official mouthpiece of authority it has practically become in many respects the controlling authority itself; and over certain things, such as enlistments, control is directly given to it. In this connection the anomalous condition of this department at Headquarters of the Army should be noted. The Adjutant-General of the Army is the mouthpiece of both the Secretary of War and the General of the Army; subordinate in part to the latter, but in position to annul his work by influence with the nonmilitary chief—issuing orders in the name of the Secretary of War to control even the General of the Army, whose mouthpiece he also is. It is on record that the lack of distinct authority in the hands of the General of the Army, with want of definite control over the staff officer issuing his orders, has caused much friction in the conduct of military affairs under many Administrations.

The general staff, if established, should have its relations to the Secretary of War and the General of the Army definitely prescribed; and assignments to it, whether temporary or permanent, should not depend on mere favor, but on merit determined under some definite system of selection. While, as indicated above, it is doubtful whether consolidation of the Inspector-General's and Adjutant-General's departments would secure exactly what is needed for a general staff, even under the most approved restrictions for future assignment to it, a properly organized general staff would perhaps give a body of officers from whom selection could best be made for temporary assignment to the special and proper duties of Adjutant-General at Headquarters of the Army and of its various subdivisions. It would also naturally supply officers for military inspections, the result of which would need to be communicated to the general staff for its proper understanding of the condition of the Army. The duties of the general staff, however, ought to be of a still wider nature, embracing the collection of military information from all sources and the evolution of plans for the execution of military operations. In this the fact is not overlooked that an officer, so long as he is in command of military expeditions actually in progress, should have unhampered control of all military operations, regulated by the nonmilitary head only in respect to the political bearing of the general movement.

The laws relating to appointments need some revision with reference to the effect given by the Senate's approval of the President's nomination even where the preliminary requirements prescribed by law have not been carried out. It is held, for instance, that if the President should by mistake appoint an officer in place of another and the Senate should confirm this it would displace the other officer and put him out of the Army. There is a case on record of the appointment of a civilian as second lieutenant, even since the laws required examination therefor, without his having passed a satisfactory examination. The confirmation by the Senate secures him in his position, and there is nothing to prevent his transfer, with advanced rank, to some staff corps for which the laws at present require appointments to be made from officers of the Army. Where nominations dependent on special qualifications are to be made, the statement that those requirements have been complied with should accompany the nomination, and confirmation by the Senate should be inoperative if these conditions have not been carried out. It is a serious matter if an incompetent man can be foisted contrary to law upon the line of the Army for the sake of making him eligible to a staff position.

To open the different corps of the Army to appointment on mere influence is worse than adopting the purchase system long used and now abandoned in the English service.

ARTILLERY AND ORDNANCE.

The plan of adopting corps organization for the artillery, as provided in both the Hull and McClellan bills, seems to possess many advantages well set forth in the report of the committee on the Hull bill. This report dwells on the complicated nature of the artillery service as compared with the infantry and cavalry services, implying the need of more varied training in the officers of artillery. At the same time, as noted before, the Hull bill proposes to promote officers of infantry and cavalry into the artillery without special inquiry into the breadth of their knowledge. The McClellan bill goes further and provides for the consolidation of the Ordnance Department with the artillery. This plan was formerly tried and abandoned, and it has been frequently urged of late years. There are many points to be made in favor of such combination. This is the system followed in the English service. There is no separate ordnance corps in our Navy, the line officers being detailed to perform ordnance duties. It is to be remembered, however, that the line of the Navy consists, with very few exceptions, of a compact body of especially trained men, graduates of the Naval Academy, and that the discipline and training of the Navy has been for years in the hands of just such men. The selection of proper officers for this duty could therefore be confidently assured.

In regard to consolidation of the present ordnance corps with the artillery, whether as the latter is at present organized or as proposed in Congress, the advantage will depend largely on the personnel of the artillery. It is to be questioned whether such attention has heretofore been paid to its composition as would insure the detail of capable men from among them; and whether the new organization proposed would immediately secure such conditions. While of late years such attention has been paid to appointments and training of the artillery officers as to secure in the lower ranks excellent material, there is doubt whether this has always been the case. It is claimed that this was not regarded in the appointments from civil life during the past summer. It would be unwise at the present time to reduce the standard demanded for entrance into the artillery, particularly if it is to affect the ordnance also. It may well be hoped, however, that the organization will be so framed that at some future time such consolidation will take place. There is undoubtedly considerable advantage to the service, and to officers themselves, to pass from theory and construction to the practical test of problems and the machines they have devised.

It is to be remembered, however, that comparatively recent laws have led to a selection for the Ordnance Department of picked officers from the Army, mostly from the artillery, who, besides having the training of a Military Academy, have had practical army service with troops, and have been called upon to pass a severe professional competitive examination to test their special fitness for the duties demanded of the Ordnance Department. It is believed that where officers are to be permanently diverted to staff duties the present system of selection for the Ordnance Department is a model for the Army. It is hardly reasonable to assume that the general run of officers of artillery would be superior for technical work to those specially culled from the Army for appointment in the Ordnance Department under a suitable examination upon their qualifications. Officers so appointed have already reached the grade of major, and it seems unwise to disturb that corps just when the new system is beginning to have full effect.

While the artillery work is rarely, even in war, carried on according to a regimental organization any more than is that of the infantry and cavalry in time of peace when split up in small garrisons, it is doubtful whether service in the heavy artillery adapts men or officers for light-artillery service, including horse artillery, any better than service in the infantry does for the cavalry. The bills provide for the transfer at will from heavy to light artillery as done at present.

The management of artillery in the field is of a tactical nature, and the duties of a chief of artillery are there quite distinct from those relating to fortress or siege artillery. In the European services the field artillery is organized into regiments quite distinct from other work of the artillery; and such a separation becomes more and more necessary as the artillery arm increases. It is believed that cavalry troops, officers and men, could be more readily transformed to field artillery than could the batteries of heavy artillery.

EQUIPMENT DEPARTMENT.

The McClellan bill, in section 15, provides for an additional department, to be called the equipment department. It is the opinion of many able officers that, instead of adding to the number of supply departments of the Army, all the duties of supply so intimately connected with the welfare and comfort of the troops as those of the Subsistence and Quartermaster's departments should be concentrated in one, and that if any separation is to be made, it should be in order to give a department solely for transportation.

VOLUNTEERS AND MILITIA.

Notwithstanding the lessons of the past year, none of the bills seem to contemplate any proper reorganization of the volunteers. In regard to the militia, we still have the antiquated laws as illustrated in sections 1625 to 1628 of the Revised Statutes. With regard to the use of the militia, the remarks of Monroe to Congress in 1814 are still true to-day:

It may be stated with confidence that at least three times the force of militia has been employed at our principal cities, along the coast and on the frontier, in marching to and returning thence, that would have been necessary in regular troops, and that the expenses attending it have been proportionately augmented from the difficulty, if not the impossibility, of preserving the same degree of system in the militia as in the regular service. The cost of putting them in the field is always disproportionately great. Another source of waste is in the time required for this. The State governments and the National Government will struggle to avoid a call of militia, even though risking great disasters by the neglect. Opposed to trained armies, they invite defeat; opposed to similar forces, decisive action on either side is impossible, and the war drags on till its cost far exceeds that of years of standing armies and peace preparations.

The report of the Adjutant-General of the Army shows that an imperfect bill was passed when the war was upon us. An earlier and more reasonable bill was killed by militia influence, since it would have stood in the way of giving militia officers, when called into the United States service, precedence over officers of the Regular Army. The militia officers claimed that the State organizations were prepared as a body to enter United States service. This prediction was not borne out by the result. The inexperience of their officers caused much suffering in the ranks of the volunteers, and it is believed that they would be the first to favor a system of Government volunteers in preparation for war, officered by trained men appointed by the General Government.

It is even proposed, however, to transfer bodily into the permanent service of the United States the immune regiments of volunteers, if not the engineer regiments of volunteers. But few of the officers of these regiments were taken from the Regular Army, while these were arbitrarily selected from the lower grades for appointment, or for examination and appointment in the case of the engineers, other officers of equal ability having no chance to compete. Admitting such regiments into the service as a body, especially when not one of them took part in any campaign, would be no more just than so transferring any regiment of State troops which might have had a single field officer of regulars with it or one composed wholly of volunteers, but having had the experience of a campaign. It would be putting volunteer officers, whether from the regulars or from civil life, into high regimental grades, to take rank in the line of promotion above worthy regular officers of long service who are now seniors to some in the regular service itself. It has been proposed to put such regiments in a separate organization from the present regular regiments. The history of such detached corps is almost invariably a later consolidation, when all the evils referred to will occur.

The substitute bill proposed for the Hull bill by the minority report of the Military Committee of the House contains all the dangerous elements of the other bills intensified, and it introduces even more fatal elements for disorganizing the future discipline and administration of the Army. While the use of volunteers in time of great and sudden emergency, inspiring the best blood of our youth to enter the service even as privates, may be necessary and practicable, in spite of the manifold difficulties we even then encounter, the attempt to give a semipermanence to such a body would make it neither one thing nor the other, and would attract a very different class of men, particularly as officers. It would expose the regular establishment to still greater danger than it now runs of having such officers placed in high positions where their want of training would most tell with disastrous consequences.

OFFICERS RETIRED AND HONORABLY DISCHARGED.

None of the bills before Congress make provision for utilization of retired officers in case of need. The Navy had the advantage of the Army in this respect during the Spanish war, for the retired Navy officers were called upon freely, wherever their physical condition would permit, to supply places, in recruiting or office work, which would have otherwise drawn away officers of the active list from sea service.

The conditions of retirement from the Army should be such that the Government, in case of actual hostilities or of extreme preparation for war, could call upon capable retired officers—possibly excepting those beyond the age limit—to perform the duties of mustering officers, quartermasters of posts, etc.

It would be well, too, to make acceptance of the resignation of an officer conditional upon the right of the Government to demand his temporary service in a like emergency, subject to a fair rating of rank in respect to his fellows who remained in the Army.

The privilege of appointment to United States Volunteer service, except with State troops, was denied to all retired officers, with one conspicuous exception of appointment to the grade of brigadier-general. With respect to service of regular officers with State troops, the governors were limited to one field officer to a regiment. Militia influence in most cases prevented even that. A better rule would be to require at least one regular officer to each regiment from a State, or an officer from among those retired or honorably discharged.

It is an unwritten law among officers who have resigned to offer their services in case of war, but there is no provision for assigning them temporarily to regular service. Cases are cited where officers so offering services were turned away because they had no political influence to back them. In the Navy temporary restoration to rank was allowed to an officer who had left the service.

PAY DEPARTMENT.

The maintenance of a separate corps for paying troops is opposed by many, and it has been proposed, though not in any of the bills now before Congress, to transfer these duties to the Quartermaster's Department. It may be questioned, rather, whether the duties of this Pay Corps should not be enlarged and extended, making it the official "disbursing department" of the Army and the only department to control its fund. Examination of the system in vogue in the different departments in the Army will show that no two follow the same rules with regard to the details of money accountability, forms of vouchers, and the minor details coming under the laws of general application. The result is that officers and clerks may be perfectly familiar with the method of rendering accounts in one department and yet be almost as unprepared as an entirely untrained man for handling the accounts of another department.

Consolidation of these duties in one department would have the effect of assimilating such rules, and would relieve the officers of the separate corps from much of the difficulty. Vouchers prepared by them could be paid by the "disbursing department." Such an organization of the Pay Department would not, however, necessarily involve the direct payment of vouchers by the regular officers of that department any more than is the case at present with payments made by the Commissary and Quartermaster's departments. The officers detailed for the latter duties at the various posts and for the smaller units of the Army have funds placed to their credit for payment, and a single officer may hereafter, as now, have to perform the duties belonging to more than one department.

In such case the simplification brought about by the proposed change would reduce their labor. While the duties of the Pay Department in this respect would not require them to pass upon the special technical nature of the articles purchased or the work done, these being matters regulated by the different departments concerned, yet it would become more necessary than ever that officers of this corps should have some military training. The settlement of accounts in the Treasury Department gives rise to such a singular condition that the following instructions are embodied in the regulations of at least one of the departments:

Disbursing officers should always bear in mind that the accounts which they state are to be examined and decided upon by accounting officers who may be unacquainted with the professional business to which the accounts relate, and who can not be presumed to be familiar with all its details, and whose duty it is to suspend or to disallow accounts the propriety of which is not made manifest to them. Terms of art or technical phrases should be sparingly used in stating accounts when terms in common use are equally applicable.

GENERAL CONSIDERATIONS.

In this discussion of the various matters brought before Congress special attention has not been paid to the size of the Army in its separate corps, nor to the details of military organization of the line except to a certain extent in the artillery, because these points are sure of careful consideration. It has been the endeavor in these remarks to free them entirely from all directly personal considerations as to the advantage or disadvantage to individuals, and it is recognized that in a systematic reorganization for considerable expansion of the Army many individual inequalities must arise which it is difficult, if not impossible, to provide for in a general bill. The argument is directed against any sweeping injustice and against organic legislation in the interest of present individual aspirants.

There is one point, however, that ought to be carefully considered, and in regard to which the officers of the Army seem to possess the right to have personal consideration given them. This is: That by an ill-considered reorganization the right they have acquired to consideration on account of faithful and long continued service—their reasonable expectancy of fair promotion and of proper advance of pay and authority—is liable to be overlooked. While it is recognized that in time of war, even of short duration, there arise some men with little or no military training who distinguish themselves in such a manner that they merit even military advancement, the numerous claims already made for the advancement of volunteers seem to make it now a question not whether the training at West Point is an advantage over other training, nor whether service in the Regular Army is an advantage over short service in the volunteers, but whether service in the volunteers, or even personal influence in civil life, is not to be counted as overshadowing long and efficient service in the Regular Army.

The ultimate object in favor of individuals, and even the hardly veiled present aim of some of the provisions in the proposed bills, under color of reward for volunteering or of improvement in efficiency of the service, would seem to make long and continuous service in the Army rather a bar to promotion in comparison with short service in the volunteers even if solely in camps of instruction, or in comparison with short previous service in the Regular Army in low grades followed by years of separation from the Army in civil life. The Hull bill throws open to civilians and volunteers, upon a mere physical examination, corps recognized as demanding special military training. While it is often the case that in the lower grades, and without special preparation, such men prove acceptable, the future should be looked to in making appointments into the Army; and it must be remembered, especially in regard to the staff corps, that it often takes but a few years to bring these men to the top, where they may need a broad knowledge of Army administration. For the special benefit of such appointees, the bill proposes to raise the limit of age for appointment to fifty years, and so admit men who have passed in civil pursuits the time of life after which as a rule they can not readily adapt themselves to new conditions. The only considerations that seem to have led the Military Committee to adopt even this limit were those of the cost to the Government of having such men put on the retired list at the age of 64 without obtaining very much service from them.

The question involved is a much more important one than that of money expenditure. It involves the future administration of the Army. At a time when strenuous effort is being made in the Navy to limit the advancement of officers above other meritorious officers on account of special services, and when some other system is sought of rewarding such men in a way which will not do injustice to others, it seems strange that for the Army a general system of military rewards should be urged for a similar kind of service. The contrast is intensified by the fact that while in the Navy the officers to be rewarded belong as a rule to the regular establishment and are recognized as trained in their profession, just the contrary is the case in the Army.

It is fatal to the efficiency of the Army to discourage ambitious men of ability from entering the service, and the tendency of the course lately pursued, and now promised continuance, is not only to drive from the Army all except those who would be satisfied by mere assurance of a secure position with moderate but sure pay, but to deter the better element among our young men from entering the Military Academy. This strikes at the source of military training. Already the desire to go to West Point as a matter of scientific education is reduced among ambitious young men by the establishment of many scientific schools throughout the country and by the many professional demands for their graduates. West Point is no longer the leading scientific or even engineering school of the country, as it used to be. It was at one time the only one. Now it must depend more than ever on the military training to attract, and on the security it gives of sure military advancement to the capable and faithful. It is not desirable to have boys go there merely to obtain an education without personal expense.

But two of the bills provide for increasing the number of students there. It is by increasing the output of the school, while maintaining its high standard, that we may obtain an adequate supply of well-trained men to well leaven the additions which must inevitably come from other sources. The military instruction in colleges should also be fostered and regulated under Army officers, to make this a recognized and efficient source of supply of officers, the gradnates being encouraged to enter the service, or being put on a roll from which officers can and shall be drawn in case more officers are needed. The Government might even demand the right, in consideration of such instruction, to call on a certain number from each class.

Officers of the Army should not be reduced to the necessity of fighting for their positions as a mere question of bread and butter. War has become more and more of a science. By the multiplication of other sciences and pursuits, the days have passed when one man could grasp all or even master one in all its branches. In many pursuits we see specialists in different branches. It is so even in the Army itself. However capable men might be of becoming great soldiers if properly trained, so long as they pursue training by choice in other fields it is as absurd for them to claim that they can at once shift to military rank in any branch of the Army as for the lawyer to assume the office of the physician in like manner with no training. In other professions men depend for support on the natural wants of their fellows, who need advice and assistance for their personal ills or tastes. There is no such personal support for the soldier. A lawyer consults an able doctor, not because the latter is an abler man—quite the reverse may be the case—but because the latter is an able doctor.

So long as men are tied to other pursuits and are unwilling or unable to devote themselves in times of peace to study of the military art, the public must maintain at general expense a body of men for that purpose. It is often said that Army officers make their choice knowing well the conditions of the position, and that they can leave the service if they do not like it; but the very training they should receive, and the nature of the service they are called on to perform, remove them from the practice of other callings and make it impossible for them to acquire a knowledge necessary for other work. They would have to start at the foot in any profession. This makes it the more obligatory on the country to prevent their being driven to such alternative after they have cast their lot and grown into it. The laws should secure to such men every incentive to excel, provide every facility for their work, compel them to maintain the highest state of efficiency, and exact thorough discipline and unquestioning obedience. If the regular establishment is not capable of this, it should be torn up root and branch and such a system adopted as will secure the object for maintaining an army.

If volunteer organizations are to form a part of our Army for war, and are to share in its rewards on equal terms with the regulars, they should be held to like restrictions. What an example for regular officers has it been to see volunteer officers making private reports, promptly published, over the heads of their military superiors, or demanding special consideration and obtaining it unrebuked! Many were their comments and criticisms, freely uttered. The officers most capable of commenting on affairs have had their tongues tied by their position in the Regular Army. Regular officers were for the most part debarred from volunteering, and they had to await special selection for volunteer rank, or to use outside influence to obtain it. A large proportion of the regulars could have obtained better attention, with their qualifications, had they been out of the service.

The insinuation is often made that officers of the Army in time of peace are idle and unoccupied. If this be true—and the idea is often due to public contact with officers only when they are off duty—it is the fault of the laws in not demanding such a thorough system of administration that officers throughout the service will feel the impulse and incentive to improvement. The conditions of garrison life, from the splitting up of the day into duties with short intervals between, interfere with sustained study. That, in spite of trying conditions at small and distant garrisons, with few resources for the mind, the officers of the line of the Army had kept up their military work and well trained their men the battles before Santiago witness. That was essentially a triumph of the regulars, and it is confidently claimed that they would have been better off without the presence of volunteers, saving, perhaps, the Rough Riders. Yet it seems to be considered that a volunteer officer from civil life who came under fire and did not run away should be specially marked for advancement.

What of the regular officers who did this while serving with their regiments and kept control of their men too? Recognition of their work is long delayed, and they are liable to be overslaughed in the reorganization by volunteers who did not leave the United States during the war.

Bravery is not the only thing that counts where bravery is the rule, and the private soldier showed this as much as anyone. The volunteer rank and file quailed only when they could not depend on their officers and trust their capacity. Is the fact that a capable officer or man of the regulars is confined to his regiment or company and that he can show his bravery only there to stand in the way of his advancement in favor of those, less experienced and less capable, who accidentally held higher positions in the volunteers without the knowledge to be of service in them? The latter stood the same danger; that is all. Ultimately all service in our Army is "voluntary." Is the temporary volunteer to be rewarded beyond the man who volunteers to stay?

In this appeal jealousy does not enter. The graduates of the Military Academy expect and are willing to stand the full test for efficiency. The officers of the Regular Army in general are willing to submit to this test. They would all be satisfied if untrained claimants were made to stand the same test, even; not to be preferred as a separate and favored class for whom special consideration shall be shown, and for whom excuses shall be made if they are ignorant—a class to whom rapid advancement is to be opened by admission to special staff corps in which the natural order of promotion may soon bring them to the head of an administration which demands thorough military training. When the laws were first passed prescribing examination for general promotions, it was specially provided that men of civil-war service should have this test of efficiency lightened, on the ground that they could not be expected to stand it as well as others. It is now proposed to reduce the test of appointment to mere physical condition, such as any man who would be allowed to enlist could pass more satisfactorily.

At present no examinations are made in the Regular Army for promotion above the rank of major, by which time an officer's qualifications may be assumed; but there is every reason why the physical examination should be extended at least to the rank of colonel in the line, to determine fitness for active service, and in the staff corps for such duty as may reasonably be expected. It is well known in Army circles that officers have been allowed to pass from the grade of major up to that of colonel, if not above, who in either grade would have had to retire if any field service had been demanded of them or if they had merely been required to use a horse as mounted officers. The approach of the Spanish war caused many such to retire from the so-called active list.

Among the majors appointed from civil life to staff corps of volunteers, above captains of the regular service who received no volunteer rank, there is already example of the boast that they could be transferred to the regular service by the same influence which procured for them in the volunteers the rank they hope to retain in the Regular Army, notwithstanding the fact that their service was entirely outside the sphere affected by the war and where they could gain no knowledge at all of actual conditions in a campaign or at military posts. If efficiency is to be the aim, the Army should not be made a retreat for the unsuccessful and inexperienced, nor a home for the aged.

If admitted into a permanent staff corps, such men are likely soon to rise by natural promotion to the rank from which chiefs of the corps are selected, and the same kind of influence that forced them into the corps will secure their choice even above more experienced men. If in addition to appointing officers in this way a system of arbitrary details should be adopted as allowed by the Miles bill, it is such men who will naturally have the influence to obtain desired positions.

This is no fancy picture. The records of the Army show that since the first period after the civil war, when officers from West Point had forged to the head, as would naturally be the result of a prolonged contest demanding the best equipped men, the tendency has been more and more to select for high honors men who were without this training but possessed powerful friends. In spite of this method of selection, many capable officers have so come to the front; but at the beginning of the Spanish war there was but one general of the line from West Point, while, with the exception of the two strictly scientific corps, the Engineers and Ordnance, not one of the heads of bureaus, Adjutant-General, Inspector-General, Quartermaster, Commissary, etc., was a graduate.

Nor does it stop here. Until the last few years, when graduates have preponderated in the lower grades of the line, the greater proportion of the staff appointments have been from nongraduates.

Among the field officers of the line, from whom will naturally be drawn the new general officers for future command of the Army, the preponderance of nongraduates is very great, except in the artillery arm, which seems to have been especially neglected in promotion to the rank of general. Such distinguished artillery officers as Hunt and Getty were passed over, and the only general officer made since the civil war from the artillery was appointed to the Army from civil life. The appended table shows the field officers of the line of the Army January 1, 1898.

This condition was an inevitable consequence of the civil war. At the time these officers were appointed the present situation could have been foretold. That war, for which it was impossible to make provision, was of such stupendous magnitude, so far exceeding the military establishment we had before, that the old control was practically swept away. We had to meet the emergency as best we could, and it was necessary as well as right and proper to call in the volunteers to fill the depleted quota of officers for which we had no adequate supply of men especially schooled. It is fortunate that we had so many ready trained in the field, though often the fact of service counted as much as the nature of the service. Naturally many so came in who were of little account. Many looked upon their new positions as given them in reward for past services, places where they could rest secure on their honors, content to simply follow the regular routine with full assurance that the mill of promotion would bring them to the top in due time, and thinking little of preparation for the future. Many trusted to securing, without reference to special fitness, and did secure positions in the staff where there would be rapid promotion, because the higher officers in the corps were old.

The necessities of that time were unique in our history, and they are not likely to recur to like extent again. The effect, however, is making itself felt in the present composition of the Army in the higher grades. It is no reflection on those officers to claim that the Army administration would gain by a greater admixture of officers trained in military principles as well as practice. The latter is in great measure limited to few phases of the art.

The trouble is that after the civil war, in the reaction from exhaustion and in the confidence that peace would last, we did not profit by its lessons to prepare for the future. Far from providing training to give us officers capable of shaping the militia and the volunteers, we made no adequate preparation to supply officers in the lower grades of the Regular Army to meet emergencies.

Even in time of peace we admitted into the Army men from the three sources of supply—graduates, enlisted men, and civilians—in platoons, as it were, each of a different kind and large enough to cause one and another set in the future to alternately fill all the grades of field officer in the Army. The slight expansion already made in the Army has of necessity brought in a disproportionate number from civil life, and the necessary increase now demanded will bring in many more, with, fortunately, many who have had volunteer experience in campaigns, or at least in an organized army of preparation. Drafts from these sources, however, should be carefully selected by means of suitable examination, and they should be confined to appointment as subalterns of the line. It does not follow that a man will make a good officer simply because he is fond of parade, interested in military drill, or attracted by the fife and drum.

From these men will come in time the commanders of the Army. It is evident that there will be inevitably enough now elements to affect materially the future administration of the Army. Is it safe to add the danger of introducing inexperienced men in higher positions, where they will sooner come to the head, delaying for that purpose the advancement of officers who have won the right to it by long and faithful service, and impressing on the younger officers in the start of their career the idea that service counts but little, influence for everything?

Throughout the middle grades will be found now more nearly the suitable proportion of graduates. It was the officers in these positions who told to best effect before Santiago. If undisturbed, these officers will in some half dozen years form the materials for the field officers, if not for generals. They will be of service in working our new Army into trim. Some of the regular regiments now starting for foreign service are half composed of recruits who do not know their facings or who can not stack arms. Many of the second lieutenants are without experience. It would be a lasting injury to the service to still further delay the desirable control of the Army by the experienced men we have, placing above them men who would have to look up to them as teachers. The effect on discipline caused by inexperienced commanders is more than temporary. It is lasting.

It is recognized that in time of war there should be some freedom of selection among the higher grades for the general command. This was the case in the Army of the Potomac during part of the civil war, officers of the same grade serving as commanders without reference to relative rank in the grade, though the conditions were vastly improved when the full control of all Army operations was put in the hands of one recognized leader. But we must make sure that we have men of capacity in those higher positions from which to select, if necessary, and that mere rank does not cover want of proper training. There may be many reasons for special assignment to secure full harmony with the Administration, but the control should be definite and covered by Executive order. The nominal commander should not be passed over and disregarded.

The power of selection was exercised to an extreme degree in the Navy during the Spanish war, when a captain was by Executive order made acting rear-admiral and placed in command over another officer who not merely outranked the former, but held the higher actual grade of commodore. Whatever may have been the injustice in this, somewhat obscured now by the fact that the former has by natural promotion reached the same actual rank as the other before the question of permanent precedence is settled, it is still to be considered that the choice lay between men of recognized ability and training, not between ability and mediocrity, though the action is the more emphatic that it occurred before either had been tested in any engagement and before the fight off Santiago introduced another element to be considered.

Arbitrary as this action has been considered, it is not a circumstance to what was a common practice in the Army. No officer of the Army was so low in rank or so disconnected with its military branches that he might not hope to be advanced to high command, or put in the way of it, for reasons wholly disconnected with military advancement. The success of anyone so pushed forward, an unforeseen and happy accident, should not obscure the danger of introducing such a dangerous method or allowing it. While every officer of the Army will applaud the personal success of anyone, however trained, in carrying out new and great responsibilities thrust upon him, it is unjust to give its military aspect more credit than is its due and to honor with permanent military rank what indicates more a personal strength of character and capacity of administration than an ability to direct armies. It was not even necessary to be in any way connected with the Army to receive high military reward.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following additional amendment.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I raise the point of order that there are two amendments pending.

Mr. FISCHER. That is a mistake. One amendment has been accepted by the committee.

Mr. HULL. We are still acting on the amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. Is the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York an amendment to the substitute or to the original text?

Mr. FISCHER. My amendment is offered as an amendment to the text.

The CHAIRMAN. An amendment to the original text would be in order.

The Clerk read as follows:

Provided further, That in time of war retired officers of the Army and retired enlisted men physically able, in the discretion of the President, may be employed on active duty other than in command of troops, and when so employed shall receive the full pay and allowances of their grades.

Mr. HULL. I want to raise the point of order upon that. This bill is for the organization of the Army, and this is no place to amend it with the provision of the kind the gentleman has introduced.

Mr. FISCHER. I understand the object of the bill is to provide for things to come, and also for many things that have already transpired, and taking care of the Army. Now, this is adding to it, and providing for officers in the Army and their promotion.

Mr. HULL. This amendment relates to taking care of retired officers.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Iowa on the point of order.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, there is another provision in the bill dealing with the retired list, and if the amendment should come in at all, it should come in at that point. The law provides for men being retired at 64 years of age. They are relieved from active service at that time by a provision of the Revised Statutes, and they can only be used as governor of the Soldiers' Home or teachers of colleges, if they are willing to go to them, but they can not be assigned. But this amendment brings them into the active force of the Army again, and the amendment of my friend has nothing to do with the section before the committee.

Mr. DOCKERY. Let us have the amendment reported again.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be again reported.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. DOCKERY. That is clearly not germane to the section.

Mr. HULL. It is not germane to the section.

Mr. FISCHER. I understand the gentleman from Iowa says that this is germane to some other section of the bill?

Mr. HULL. If it is germane at all, it ought to come in that part of the bill that deals with the retired list.

Mr. FISCHER. Which point do you think it is germane to?

Mr. HULL. I do not believe it is germane; but if it is at all, it is to that part which refers to the retired list.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks it is not germane to the section under consideration.

Mr. FISCHER. It is germane to the bill, however; and I desire to have it read and printed, so that it may be called up at the proper place.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, if I understood the Chair aright, he ruled that the amendment of the gentleman from New York was out of order. It seems to me that the whole bill is out of order; and when the gentleman from Kentucky asked the gentleman in charge of the bill about its parentage, he did not disclose as to its parentage. He acknowledged that he stood by the bedside at its birth and assisted somewhat [laughter], but that he was not its legitimate parent. [Renewed laughter.] It seems to me that it is the illegitimate child of the Republican party, and none of them have the courage yet to acknowledge its parentage.

Mr. GRIFFIN. You will find that it will be a very healthy infant.

Mr. SIMPSON. So that point of order could be properly raised against the whole bill (Hull bill). [Laughter.] I have been considerably amused as well as instructed in listening to the general debate as well as the debate under the five-minute rule.

I listened to the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], and I saw him when he stood up singly and alone on his own side as the one willing to represent the courage of his convictions; and I saw him when he stood up here and made a speech on this bill, in which he talked very loudly and learnedly about the great problems opened up in this bill, but unfortunately for the House and the country he did not inform us what those great problems were that this bill is going to solve.

He did not tell us and he did not know what course the President is going to pursue with reference to expansion or the annexation of the Philippine Islands, but he finally said that he was willing at all times, in season and out of season, to stand by whatever his party wanted him to stand by. [Laughter.] He virtually acknowledged that this new kind of statesmanship, of which he is the champion, would surrender, and surrender to the power in the White House, the power that has been delegated to him by his constituents.

For if I understand the genius of this Government aright, it is that the country is divided into political divisions called Congressional districts, and that they every two years elect Representatives here to enact into law the wishes and will of their constituents. Now, this gentleman from Pennsylvania surrenders all that power and becomes a kind of a "me-too" Congressman. [Laughter.] Why, the gentleman would not know in the morning——

Mr. MAHON. I represent the people of my district.

Mr. SIMPSON. He would not know in the morning until he read his paper and found what the President stood for [laughter], and then he would come up here in the morning after the President said "Me," and he would say, in a little squeaky voice, "Me, too." [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] This is a new kind of statesmanship; and unfortunately for the country there is too much of it. I admire the stamina and backbone and heroism of the gentleman from Indiana, who stood up against the sneers and jeers of his party for what he believed to be right.

Mr. STEELE. We will always do that.

Mr. SIMPSON. I can admire the courage of the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the gentleman from Kansas be allowed five minutes more.

Mr. HULL. I object to any extension.

Mr. DOCKERY. This is peculiarly interesting.

Mr. HULL. I object.

Mr. DOCKERY. I hope you will not object.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the amendment and the substitute is exhausted. The question is on the amendment to the substitute.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute.

The question was taken; and the substitute was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. There is no last word to strike out. [Laughter.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Well, as soon as there is a last word, I want to strike it out. [Laughter.]

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Inspector-General's Department shall consist of 1 Inspector-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; 4 inspectors-general, with the rank of colonel; 5 inspectors-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and 9 inspectors-general, with the rank of major: Provided, That all vacancies created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion and appointment as now prescribed by law, but no person shall be appointed to the position of major and inspector-general until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination similar to that required for promotion to the rank of major prescribed by regulations made under the act of Congress approved October 1, 1890.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. The five-minute rule cut off what I intended to say on the other section. I did say that I was satisfied beyond all controversy—and I am not complaining of the gentlemen on that side of the House—that they had made up their minds deliberately to make an issue of this contest over the annexation of territory and what shall be done with the Philippine Islands—a political question in the next Presidential campaign. Any man can see by reading the Democratic papers in this country, and the action of the Democrats in the House, that it makes no difference what the President of the United States does, these gentlemen will oppose it. I have no quarrel with them for making a political issue, but I believe in taking up the glove every time they throw it down; and if they make it an issue, I appeal to Republicans on this side of the House to stand like a solid wall against them.

Mr. SIMPSON. Right or wrong.

Mr. MAHON (continuing). If we are to take the responsibility of working out these problems, we will take it. I believe in the Republican party handling the great questions before us.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I am asked what I would do with the Philippine Islands. I would do what the gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] said he would do. I would have enough men down there to control the Filipinos and protect the Americans, Germans, English, and men of all nationalities at Manila and other ports of the islands in their mercantile transactions. I would protect their persons and lives from the hands of the insurgent leaders, whose only purpose is to pillage and destroy.

How to work out these problems the future alone will tell. I simply say that the Republican party in the past has worked out far greater problems than confront us to-day. The Republican party at its birth was dedicated to the cause of human freedom and liberty, and on that line it has marched ever since 1856, and will continue to march as long as it shall exist, and all this talk about the Republican Administration putting shackles and irons onto the people of the Philippine Islands is the veriest rot. The Republican party has never been guilty of a great crime like that and never will be. The Republican party has made mistakes, but it never committed a crime consciously; the respect it has for the right always has been, is to-day, and ever shall be its lifeblood. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Now, the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] talks about my being "Me, too." [Laughter.] I have never been afraid, at home or away, to give voice to my convictions. I am a Republican of Republicans. Down in my State I am known as a stalwart Republican. I am one of the men who believe that the Republican party is right and stands for the best interests of this country, and I believe that the man who serves his party best when its principles are right serves his country best. [Applause.]

Now, up in my district, which covers nearly one-third of Pennsylvania, we have no Populists, we have no demagogues. I want to say to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] that if he were put on a Democratic ticket in my State and he made the same speeches that he makes here and in Kansas, he would not get 400 votes out of the 14,000 Democratic votes in that district. [Applause on the Republican side.] He talks about other people being demagogues. I have been in the House six years, and of all the demagogues of demagogues the worst demagogue has been the gentleman from Medicine Lodge. [Laughter on the Republican side.]

Mr. Chairman, he is recognized all over the country as the demagogue of this Congress. He does not voice his own convictions, but simply works for party advantage. But I have no quarrel with him, if he wants to sustain his organization, if he wants to stand by the Democratic party—because my judgment of a Populist is that he is a rectified, double-distilled Democrat—he can do so. I have been in this Congress for six years, and I never saw a Populist vote with the Republican party yet upon any political question.

Mr. STRAIT rose.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN (Mr. SHERMAN). The gentleman from South Carolina [Mr. STRAIT].

Mr. SIMPSON. A question of personal privilege, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Arising out of a matter now under consideration?

Mr. SIMPSON. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Kansas will be recognized on a question of personal privilege.

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] in his speech just now alluded to me personally and designated me as a demagogue, which I take it he meant for an offensive epithet. [Laughter.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Can a member rise to a question of personal privilege in Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. Only on a matter that arises at the time in the Committee of the Whole.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, in my experience here in this House I have made one discovery among others, that when a gentleman is cornered in debate and finds he is on the wrong side he generally retorts by calling his opponent a demagogue.

A MEMBER. Or coward.

Mr. SIMPSON. I have discovered also that it does not require very much ability to say a thing of that kind. I may be a demagogue; but I want to remind the gentleman who makes that charge that if I have been a demagogue, it is because I have erred on the side of the people. I have tried to find out from the best light that I had, first, what was for the best interests of the people whom I represented, and then what was for the best interests of the people of the United States. I have tried to follow that line of action. In voting and in debate I have sought to determine what was for the best interests of all the people. If that is being a demagogue, then I am a demagogue.

Since I have been a member of this House I have voted sometimes with one side of the House and sometimes with the other. I have voted with the Republicans when I thought they were right, and then I was called a "demagogue" by some of the Republicans; and I have voted with this side of the House when I thought they were right, and then I have been called a "demagogue" by gentlemen on the other side.

A MEMBER. Then we are unanimous on that question.

Mr. SIMPSON. If a member of this House follows out his honest convictions and votes for what he believes is right and for the best interests of the people, he is liable to fall under the displeasure of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. WILLIAMS of Mississippi (to Mr. SIMPSON). You have never been a plutogogue.

Mr. SIMPSON. I want to say, as suggested by my friend from Mississippi, that I have never been a plutogogue, and I never want to be.

The gentleman from Pennsylvania, referring to me, says that I could not get any votes in the State of Pennsylvania if I should run for Congress there. Why, sir, of course not. I could not, because of my well-known convictions as an opponent of the plutocracy and to the schemes of corporations, trusts, and combines, who elect members of Congress in Pennsylvania [laughter and applause], and therefore nobody but his kind of a demagogue could get votes in that State. A State that has as a conspicuous candidate for the United States Senate a gentleman now under indictment upon criminal charges for robbing a bank will certainly never have very many Populist or Democratic votes while it is in that condition.

Mr. Chairman, I do not want to take up the time of the House. I will only say in this connection that this is an old charge which has been hurled at me, not alone in this House, but in every campaign, and it has been hurled at every man who attempts to stand up for what is right and takes the side of the common people. But I want the gentleman, and all others who use such epithets, to understand that I do not care for them.

I consider it an honor to be called a Democrat—I mean a demagogue [laughter]—by such men as the gentleman from Pennsylvania. Aye, or a Democrat, either. [Renewed laughter.] Democrat is an honorable name, since at the Chicago convention that great party purified and purged itself and threw out the plutocracy that has since joined the Republican party. [Applause.] I want to say now that such epithets have no terror for me, not even when they come from so eloquent a gentleman as the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

Mr. MAHON. I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania rises to a question of personal privilege.

Mr. MAHON. I want to say to the gentleman from Kansas that when he flung across this Chamber the insinuation which he did, that I was hanging onto somebody's coat tail, I replied in a spirit which I thought the remark called for. When any other man gets his club out I always reach for mine.

The gentleman admits that his own side of the House has charged him with being a demagogue; he admits that this side of the House has charged him with being a demagogue. And, sir, his own constituents, at the last election, have branded him as a demagogue and have decided to leave him at home. [Applause on the Republican side.]

Mr. HULL. There are no amendments pending to this section. I move that all debate on this section be now closed.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HULL, it was agreed to; there being on a division (called for by Mr. HAY and Mr. LACEY)—ayes 90, noes 80.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. MAGUIRE. My inquiry is this: The gentleman from South Carolina having taken the floor to debate the pending amendment, having been recognized, and then having been taken off the floor by questions of personal privilege, can the Committee of the Whole close debate and deny him the right to proceed.

The CHAIRMAN. It certainly can. The gentleman from South Carolina did not reclaim the floor. The Clerk will now read the next section of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 7. That the Inspector-General's Department shall consist of 1 Inspector-General with the rank of brigadier-general; 4 inspectors-general with the rank of colonel; 5 inspectors-general with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and 9 inspectors-general with the rank of major: Provided, That all vacancies created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion and appointment as now prescribed by law, but no person shall be appointed to the position of major and inspector-general until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination similar to that required for promotion to the rank of major prescribed by regulations made under the act of Congress approved October 1, 1890.

The amendment reported by the committee was read, as follows:

Add at the end of the section the following:
"Provided, That it shall be the duty of inspectors-general to make duplicate reports, one of which shall be forwarded immediately to the commanding officer in the field, and the other to the Inspector-General of the Army."

Mr. HULL. I rise simply for the purpose of calling for a vote on this amendment. I do not want to cut off debate until there has been a reasonable amount of it. This amendment was proposed in committee by the gentleman from Virginia and unanimously adopted there.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman permit me to ask a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. The gentleman from Iowa, the chairman of the committee, stated that when we reached the question of the staff there was going to be some cutting off. Now, we have gone through sections in reference to staff officers in two departments, and we have not cut off any. I would like to have the gentleman tell the House when the cutting off will come.

Mr. HULL. I will say to the gentleman from Virginia that the staff will be reduced altogether 322; but it is not proposed to make reductions in these two departments. And, Mr. Chairman, I will say to the gentleman, while I am on the floor, that the Adjutant-General's force was increased seven, as he knows; and that the Inspector-General's Department was also increased, making a total increase of nine in the Inspector-General's Department; and the committee believed that it was absolutely necessary to make the increase, which was deemed necessary for these branches of the service.

Take the Adjutant-General's Department, for instance, as an indication of the necessity for the increase which was made. They are at work in that department from 9 o'clock in the morning until 6 o'clock at night, and frequently until 12 o'clock at night.

The Inspector-General's Department is, as it were, the eye of the Army; and it is absolutely impossible to make the necessary inspection which the military service requires with the present force. There is no difference of opinion in that regard at the War Department, and I am sure that gentlemen will not assert that there is not a necessity for this increase.

Mr. HAY. I am obliged to the gentleman from Iowa for telling what the committee did.

Mr. HULL. I am only speaking now in the interest of the best regulation which can be made for the military service.

Mr. HAY. I am obliged for the information, because we have had no information as to what the Committee on Military Affairs has devised or seek to devise in this regard.

Mr. HULL. The amendment which is now before the House was agreed upon by the committee unanimously.

Mr. HAY. I am not opposing that amendment. I did not refer to it——

Mr. McCLELLAN. What is the purpose of the pending amendment?

Mr. HAY. That the report shall be made to the Inspector-General in Washington.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Why should that not be done? What is the objection?

Mr. HULL. The committee has considered the matter, and as it had not been done heretofore, they did think it necessary to make the change which the amendment contemplates.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Iowa offer an amendment?

Mr. HULL. Yes; on page 9——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands the gentleman to offer this amendment on behalf of the committee?

Mr. STRAIT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to submit, with the consent of the House, in this connection and at this point, some remarks of the Rev. Henry Van Dyke, D. D., of New York. I have not taken any of the time in debate, and ask that I be permitted to submit these remarks as my own on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HAY. I understand the gentleman has that right under the rule anyway.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks so; but the gentleman asks consent to print certain remarks by the Rev. Mr. Van Dyke. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. SHATTUC. Mr. Chairman, I object.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks that the objection comes too late, as consent has already been given.

The article referred to is as follows:

THE AMERICAN BIRTHRIGHT AND THE PHILIPPINE POTTAGE.

[A sermon preached on Thanksgiving Day, 1898, by Henry Van Dyke, D. D., LL. D., pastor of the Brick Church in New York City.]

Hebrews, xii, 16: "Esau, who for one morsel of meat sold his birthright."

This is the most important Thanksgiving Day that has been celebrated by the present generation of Americans. Three and thirty years have rolled away since we gave thanks for the ending of the civil war. Never since that time has our national religious festival been observed under such brilliant sunlight of prosperity or with such portentous clouds of danger massed along the horizon.

It is a significant Thanksgiving because we have extraordinary causes for national gratitude. The first and greatest of these causes is the superabundant harvest with which, for the second year in succession, God has rewarded the patient toilers who are the strength and pride of our country. This harvest includes not only the fruits of the earth but also the manifold products of human industry. The true power of a nation is in the character of its workers. The true glory of a nation is in the quality of their workmanship. The true prosperity of a nation is in the reward which God bestows upon their work. For this reward, far greater than it has ever been before in our history, let us give our first and our deepest thanks.

The second cause for gratitude to-day is the new evidence that we have received of the union of the whole American people in loyalty and patriotism. The gaping wounds left by the civil war have closed. There is no bloody chasm between the North and the South. The President presides over a united country, responding as one man to a call to support the national honor; and the brave men who once wore the gray uniform are ready to march again beside the "boys in blue" under the starry flag of American freedom. For this glorious restoration of the spirit of national unity let us give joyous and united thanks.

The third cause for gratitude is the renewal of cordial amity between the two leading nations of the world—Great Britain and the United States. The clouds of jealousy and distrust which have so often risen between England and America seem to have faded entirely away. These two sister countries, representing in widely different political forms the triumphant spirit of Anglo-Saxon civilization, rejoice together in the clear sunlight of warm and vital sympathy. Such a friendship is nobler and more secure than any kind of partnership. A true and open amity between Great Britain and the United States, undisturbed by any rivalries in the dangerous business of imperial conquest, unthreatened by any secret and selfish compact to divide the spoils of territorial war, would be a powerful guaranty of the peace of the world. For this unchartered friendship with our kinsmen across the sea let us give sincere and prudent thanks.

The fourth cause for thanksgiving to-day is the signal victory that has been granted to our country's arms in a war undertaken for the destruction of the ancient Spanish tyranny in the Western Hemisphere and the liberation of the oppressed people of Cuba. How reluctantly the American people took up the cross of war after thirty-three years of peace none can know except those who have read the peace-loving heart of the great silent classes, the happy, industrious, prosperous classes of our country. The call of humanity was the only summons that could have roused them: the cause of liberty was the only cause for which they would have fought. No party, no Administration, could have received the loyal support of the whole people unless it had written on its banner the splendid motto, "Not for gain, not for territory, but for freedom and human brotherhood!" That avowal alone made the war possible and successful. For that cause alone Christians could pray with a sincere heart, and mothers give their sons to death by slaughter or disease, and lovers of liberty take up the unselfish sword. The cause is won: the last vestige of the Spanish power in the Western Hemisphere is broken; Cuba is free. Proud of the splendid discipline and courage and compassion of our Navy, proved at Manila and Santiago; proud of the personal bravery of the true heroes in our Army who endured unknown hardships and were patient under incredible difficulties, and who faced with equal daring the pestilence that walked in darkness through the camps of death and the invisible bullets that sang through the cruel sunlight of Guantanamo and San Juan Hill; proud and glad of all that American soldiers and sailors have done this year in the cause of liberty, we present our offerings upon the solemn altar of gratitude. For the Divine guidance and protection, without which a victory so complete and swift, even over an inferior foe, could never have been won, let us give most humble and hearty thanks.

But this Thanksgiving Day is not significant alone in its causes for gratitude. It is an important day, a marked day, an immensely serious day, because it finds us, suddenly and without preparation, face to face with the most momentous and far-reaching problem of our national history.

The question that came upon us at the close of the Revolution was serious. Should the liberated colonies separate, or should they unite? But the leaders of the people had been long preparing to meet it; and the irresistible pressure of reason and sympathy consolidated the nation.

The question that came upon us in the civil war was urgent and weighty. Could the Republic continue to exist "half slave, half free?" But again the minds of the wise and fearless were ready with the well-considered answer, wrought out after painful years of conflict. Slavery must die that the Republic might live.

The question that comes upon us to-day is less urgent, but it is vaster—more fraught with incalculable consequences.

Are the United States to continue as a peaceful Republic, or are they to become a conquering empire? Is the result of the war with Spain to be the banishment of European tyranny from the Western Hemisphere, or is it to be the entanglement of the western Republic in the rivalries of European kingdoms? Have we set the Cubans free, or have we lost our own faith in freedom? Are we still loyal to the principles of our forefathers, as expressed in the Declaration of Independence, or are we now ready to sell the American birthright for a mess of pottage in the Philippines?

Nine months ago no one dreamed of such a question. Not one American in five hundred could have told you what or where the Philippines were; if any one thought of their possession as a possible result of the war, he kept the thought carefully concealed.

Six months ago, while Admiral Dewey's triumphant fleet was resting in Cavite Bay, there were not 50 people in the country who regarded his victory as the first step in a career of imperial conquest in the far East; the question of reversing a whole national policy and extending our dominion at one stroke of the sword over a vast and populous group of islands in the China Sea was utterly unconsidered.

Without warning, without deliberation, and apparently without clear intention, it has been made the burning question of the day. Never has fate sprung a more trying surprise upon an unsuspecting and ingenuous people. Never has the most difficult problem of a great republic been met so hastily, so lightly, or with such inconsiderate confidence. And, as if to add to the irony of the situation, political leaders assure us not only that the question has been raised unintentionally, but also that it has been already settled involuntarily. Without any adequate discussion, without any popular vote, without any intelligent and responsible leadership, by a mysterious and non-resident destiny, by the accident that a Spanish fleet destroyed on the 1st of May, 1898, was in the harbor of Manila instead of on the high seas, the future career of the American Republic has been changed irrevocably; the nation has been committed to a policy of colonial expansion, and the United States of America have been transformed into the "United States and Conquered Territories of America and the China Sea." Surely this is the veriest comedy of self-government, the most ridiculous blind-man's buff of national development that ever a scorner of democracy dared to imagine. If it were true, it would be a humorous commentary on the Declaration of Independence and a farcical finale of the American Revolution.

But, fortunately, it is not true. There is an old-fashioned document called the American Constitution which was expressly constructed to discourage the unconscious humor of such sudden changes. Before the die is cast the people must be taken fairly into the game; before the result is irrevocable the Supreme Court must pass upon the rules and the play. The question whether the American birthright is to be bartered for the Philippine pottage is still open. A brief, preliminary discussion of this question will not be out of place this morning.

I wish to confine the question to the precise form in which it is put. The case of Cuba does not enter into it. There is no proposal at present to do anything more for Cuba than we promised: to guarantee peace, order, and free government to a neighboring people. That is a fine thing to do.

Nor do the cases of the Hawaiian Islands and Porto Rico come clearly and altogether within the question. The legal Government of Hawaii has asked for annexation to the United States: Porto Rico is a small island, close at hand, and inhabited principally by white people who have received us willingly and are already asking for Territorial government. Whatever objections there may be to taking such territories under our flag, there is at least no flagrant violation of American principles. No one can say that these islands are annexed absolutely without hope or prospect of their ever becoming a real part of the Republic. There is at least some shadow of resemblance between their annexation and the process by which the contiguous Territories of Texas and Louisiana were acquired, civilized, and incorporated into the Union. The shadow is very thin, to be sure, but it is perceptible.

But in the case of the Philippines there is a glaring difference. No man of intelligence ventures to deny it; many openly rejoice in the difference. The proposal to annex, by force, or purchase, or forcible purchase, these distant, unwilling, and semibarbarous islands is hailed as a new and glorious departure in American history. A new word—imperialism—has been coined to define it. It is frankly confessed that it involves a departure from ancient traditions; it is openly boasted that it leaves the counsels of Washington and Jefferson far behind us forever. Because of this novelty, because of this separation from what we once counted a most precious heritage, I venture to ask whether this bargain offers any fit compensation for the loss of our American birthright?

I. Let us consider the arguments in favor of it. They may be summed up under three heads—the argument from duty, the argument from destiny, and the argument from desperation.

1. The argument from duty comes first, because it is the strongest with honest and conscientious men. Undoubtedly we have incurred responsibilities by the late war and we must meet them in a manly spirit, but certainly these responsibilities are not unlimited. They are bounded on one side by our rights. The very question at issue is whether we have a right to deny the principles of our Constitution by conquering unwilling subjects and annexing tributary colonies to our domain. On the other side, our responsibilities are bounded by our abilities. It is never a duty to attempt a task which there is no prospect of performing with real usefulness. We surely owe the Filipinos the very best we can give them consistently with our other responsibilities; but it is far from being certain that the best thing we can do for them is to make them our vassals. If that were true, our whole duty would not be done, the humane results of the war would not be completed, until we had annexed the misgoverned Spaniards of Spain also. No argument drawn from our duty to an oppressed and suffering race can be applied to the conquest of the Philippine Islands which does not apply with equal and even with greater force to the conquest of the Iberian Peninsula.

2. The argument from destiny is not an argument; it is a phrase. It takes for granted all that is in dispute; it clothes itself in glittering rainbows and introduces the question of debate in the disguise of a fact accomplished. "Yesterday," says a brilliant orator, "there were four great nations ruling the world and dividing up the territories of barbarous tribes—Great Britain, Russia, France, and Germany—to-day there are five, for America has entered the arena of colonial conquest." But how came the great Republic in that strange copartnership? By what device was she led blindfold into that curious company? What does she there? What must she forfeit to obtain her share in the partition of spoils? That is the question. To talk of destiny is not to discuss, but to dodge, the point at issue.

3. The argument from desperation directly contradicts the argument from destiny. It presents the annexation of the Philippines, not as a glorious accomplishment, but as a hard necessity. We must do it because there is nothing else that we can do. A speaker less brilliant than the orator of the five nations, but more cautious, puts the case in a sentence: "We have got a wolf by the ears and we can't let go."

The answer to this is simple. We have not got the wolf at present, though we are trying our best to get hold of him. It is absurd to say that the only way for us to get out of our difficulties is to go into the enterprise of wolf keeping. Nothing has yet been said or done which binds us to take permanent possession of these islands. Granting that the Philippines need a strong hand to set them in order, it has not been shown that ours is the only hand, nor that we must do it all alone. A protectorate for a limited time and with the purpose of building up a firm self-government would be one of the possible solutions of the difficulty. To pass this by and say that our only resort is to assume sovereignty of these yet unconquered islands is merely to beg the question.

No, these contradictory arguments from duty and destiny and despair do not touch the real spring of the movement for colonial expansion. It is the prospect of profit that makes those distant islands gleam before our fancy as desirable acquisitions. The argument drawn from the supposed need of creating and fortifying new outlets for our trade has the most practical force. It is the unconscious desire of rivaling England in her colonial wealth and power that allures us to the untried path of conquest; and this in spite of the fact that during the last seven years England, with all her colonies, has lost 5 per cent of her export trade, while the United States, without colonies, have gained 18 per cent. It is a secret discontent with the part of a peaceful, self-contained nation that urges us to take an armed hand in the partition of the East and exchange our birthright for a mess of pottage.

II. Let us weigh the arguments against such a course.

1. It is contrary to the Constitution of the United States as interpreted by the Supreme Court. The authority of that magnificent tribunal in which the Anglo-Saxon ideal of the supremacy of law is forever embodied more clearly and powerfully than in any other human institution is clearly against the legitimacy of a policy of colonial expansion for this Republic as now constituted. "There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure. * * * No power is given to acquire a Territory to be held and governed permanently in that character."*

It is idle and foolish to urge against this that the Federal Government has the power to make war and to conclude peace. War is to be made and peace concluded in harmony with the Constitution—not over its ruins.

2. Every following step in the career of colonial imperialism will bring us into conflict with our own institutions and necessitate constitutional change or insure practical failure. Our Government, with its checks and balances, with its prudent and conservative divisions of power, is the best in the world for peace and self-defense, but the worst in the world for what the President called, a few months ago, "criminal aggression." We can not compete with monarchies and empires in the game of land grabbing and vassal ruling. We have not the machinery, and we can not get it, except by breaking up our present system of government and building a new fabric out of the pieces. Republics have not been successful as rulers of colonies. When they have entered that career they have changed quickly into monarchies or empires. The supposed analogy between England and America is a fatal illusion. British institutions are founded, as Gladstone has said, on the doctrine of inequality. American institutions are founded on the doctrine of equality. If we become a colonizing power, we must abandon our institutions or be paralyzed by them. The swiftness of action, the secrecy, not to say slipperiness of policy, and the absolutism of control, which are essential to success in territorial conquest and dominion, are inconsistent with republicanism as America has interpreted it. Imperialism and democracy, militarism and self-government are contradictory terms. A government of the people, by the people, for the people is impregnable for defense, but impotent for conquest. When imperialism comes in at the door democracy flies out at the window. An imperialistic democracy is an impossible hybrid; we might as well speak of an atheistic religion or a white blackness. To enter upon a career of colonial expansion with our present institutions is to court failure or to prepare for silent revolution.

3. There is an equally serious objection to the attempt to launch the United States upon the business of acquiring vassal colonies and governing distant and inferior races in the poor outfit of our people for such a task.

It is said that we must begin or we shall never learn; the trouble is that we have already begun, but we have not learned. I am not speaking now in the spirit of pessimism or despair of the American people. No man could have a more profound confidence in their native ability, their fundamental integrity, and their ultimate common sense. It is to this common sense that I would appeal for a candid judgment of our preparation for an imperial career at the present moment.

Let us be on our guard against the flattering comparison with England. The English people have a natural genius for governing inferior races—a steady head, an inflexible hand, and a superb self-confidence. What proof have we given of any such extraordinary genius in our dealing with inferior races? Does the comparison of the treatment of the Indians in Canada and in the United States give us a comfortable sense of pride? Is the condition of drunken and disorderly Alaska a just encouragement to larger enterprises? Is our success in treating the Chinese problem and the negro problem so notorious that we must attempt to repeat it on a magnified scale 8,000 miles away? The rifle shots that ring from Illinois and the Carolinas, announcing a bloody skirmish of races in the very heart of the Republic—are these the joyous salutes that herald our advance to rule 8,000,000 more of black and yellow people in the islands of the Pacific Ocean?

England has a magnificent civil service at the foundation of her colonial empire. What have we? A recently unstarched civil service in New York, a civil service in Washington which is threatened with a new and serious crippling, and a persistent endemic of boss rule all over the country. These things are not good guaranties that we shall send our best, our cleanest, our most educated young men to fill the offices in our distant colonies. And even if we could be sure that such men would be sent, they are more needed at home than they are abroad. We have no such domestic surplus of men and deficit of work as England has. Her tiny territory and immense population mark her necessity, even as our immense territory, not yet fully peopled nor wisely ruled, marks our. For a country in our position to set out upon the adventure of colonial conquest promises discredit to ourselves and discomfort to our vassals. With our unsolved problems staring us in the face, our cities misgoverned, and our Territories neglected, the cry of to-day—not the cry of despair, but the cry of hope and courage—must be "Americans for America!"

4. Another weighty argument against the annexation of the Philippines is the frightful burden which it will almost certainly impose upon the people.

First, a burden of military service. If we do this thing we dare not do it halfway. A great colonial power must have an army and a navy equal to any in the world. An expansion of territory to a line 10,000 miles away means a new frontier of danger which can only be defended by an enormous armament. No one can tell how large a military force we must ultimately create. But this anyone can foretell: the ranks must be kept full; and if Americans do not thirst for garrison duty in the Tropics they must be compelled or bought to serve. On the one hand we see a system of conscription like that of Germany, where every man child is born with a soldier's collar around his neck; on the other hand we see an enormous drain upon the earnings of the people, like England's annual budget of $236,000,000 for the army and navy.

Second, a burden of heavy taxation. The cost of militarism comes out of the pockets of the people. So far as armies and navies are needed, their expense must be cheerfully borne. I am no advocate of parsimony in national defense; our American Navy has been worth all that it has cost; and if our Army has disappointed us in any way it is because we have not realized its importance nor treated it with generosity and prudence. But to willfully increase our need of military force by an immense and unnecessary extension of our frontier of danger is to bind a heavy burden and lay it upon the unconscious backs of future generations of toiling men. If we enter the course of foreign conquest, the day is not far distant when we must spend in annual preparation for wars more than the $180,000,000 that we now spend every year in the education of our children for peace.

Third. A burden of interminable and bloody strife. Expansion means entanglement; entanglement means ultimate conflict. The great nations of Europe are encamped around the China Sea in arms. If we go in among them we must fight when they blow the trumpet. Lord Salisbury says with characteristic frankness: "The appearance of the American Republic among the factors, at all events, of Asiatic, and possibly of European diplomacy, is a grave and serious event which may not conduce to the interests of peace, though I think, in any event, it is likely to conduce to the interest of Great Britain."

Hear the unintentional warning of an interested friend! Colonial expansion means coming strife; the annexation of the Philippines means the annexation of a new danger to the world's peace. The acceptance of imperialism means that we must prepare to beat our plowshares into swords and our pruning hooks into spears, and be ready to water distant lands and stain foreign seas with an ever-increasing torrent of American blood. Is it for this that philanthropists and Christian preachers urge us to abandon our peaceful mission of enlightenment and thrust forward, sword in hand, into the arena of imperial conflict?

*Supreme Court, Scott vs. Sanford, December, 1856.

5. But the chief argument against the forcible extension of American sovereignty over the Philippines is that it certainly involves the surrender of our American birthright of glorious ideals. "This imitation of Old World methods," said one of our most powerful journals (The Outlook, July 2, 1898) a few months ago, "by the New World appears to us to be based upon an entire disregard not merely of American precedents but of American principles."

I do not speak now of our word of honor, tacitly pledged to the world, when we disclaimed "any disposition or intention to exercise any sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, except for the pacification thereof." It is said that this was a limited promise; that it was meant to be taken in a Pickwickian sense; that it applies only to the island of Cuba. Pass it by.

But how can we pass by the solemn and majestic claim of our Declaration of Independence that "government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed"? How can we abandon the principle for which our fathers fought and died, "No taxation without representation"?

Men have told me that it is a useless task to discuss the question that we have been considering this morning. It is too late. A distinguished diplomatist (one who believes that the war with Spain might have been avoided if he had been given more time to complete his negotiations) said to me the other night: "You argue in vain. It is no more possible to check imperialism than it would be to stop the chip that has gone over Niagara Falls." I for one refuse to believe in the disastrous simile. There is still time to avert, or at least to modify, the catastrophe if the people will but realize what it means. There is still time to utter a sincere protest against the final commitment of the Republic to the new and perilous policy of undisguised imperialism. There is still time to call for a halt and an intelligent discussion before an archipelago of conquered islands on the other side of the globe is made a permanent part of the domain of the United States of America.

Anonymous patriots have written to warn me that it is a dangerous task to call for this discussion. It imperils popularity. The cry of to-day is: "Wherever the American flag has been raised it never must be hauled down." The man who will not join that cry may be accused of disloyalty and called a Spaniard. So be it, then. If the price of popularity is the stifling of conviction, I want none of it. If the test of loyalty is to join in every thoughtless cry of the multitude, I decline it. I profess a higher loyalty—allegiance to the flag, not for what it covers, but for what it means.

There is one thing that can happen to the American flag worse than to be hauled down. That is to have its meaning and its message changed.

Hitherto it has meant freedom, and equality, and self-government, and battle only for the sake of peace. Pray God its message may never be altered.

May the luster of its equal stars never be dimmed by the shadow of the crowned imperial eagle. May its stripes of pure red and white never be crossed by the yellow bar-sinister of warfare for conquest. May it never advance save to bring liberty and self-government to all beneath its folds. May it never retreat save from a place where its presence would mean disloyalty to the American idea. May it float untarnished and unchanged save by the blossoming of new stars in its celestial field of blue. May all seas learn to welcome it, and all lands look to it as the emblem of the great Republic; the mountain peak of nations, lonely, if need be, till others have risen to her lofty standard.

God keep her from lowering her flag from that proud solitude of splendor to follow the fortunes of the conquering sword.

God save the birthright of the one country on earth whose ideal is not to subjugate the world, but to enlighten it.

[Mr. COWHERD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. WHEELER of Kentucky. Mr. Chairman, I shall offer no criticism upon the details of this bill. I am not sufficiently advised in military affairs to do that. It is against the system that I desire to protest, for I am unwilling that this bill should be completed without entering a protest against the inauguration of a system which I believe to be fraught with danger to the American people. The most insidious and dangerous enemy of a free people is the spirit of militarism. The love of military glory has sapped the vigor and destroyed the fabric of every people who have risen to empire and renown. The Anglo-Saxon alone has escaped the universal judgment, and we find to-day one family of this great race struggling beneath the Titanic load of soldier and sailor. We are answering the appeal of the greatest despot in Europe for disarmament by a proposition to quadruple the standing army of the United States. Sir, if this bill was offered to carry into execution a fixed purpose resulting from the settled policy of this Government, I should be swift to support it; but I deny that it delivers the judgment of the American people.

For the first time in my limited experience as a member of this body the committee has scrupulously guarded the reasons for offering to the Congress an important bill, and no man can now say why or for what reason it is proposed to foist upon the American people a hundred thousand soldiers as a standing army. If it be claimed that it is to establish justice and maintain law in Cuba, it may readily be answered that the substitute accomplishes that purpose, but draws the pernicious fangs of this bill by providing that the increase shall be temporary. I deny, sir, that there is any occasion for an increase of the standing Army. Stripped of its deceptive teguments, with the whole truth declared, it is the purpose of the Executive to establish military supremacy in the Philippines. This is contrary and hostile to the will of our people. No one is willing now to father such a purpose. If it be, sir, that Cuba and Porto Rico need a great standing army, what will be the answer? To tax the American people $150,000,000 per annum for those possessions, that scarce equal in area, population, and wealth many Congressional districts of this country.

It is, however, against the inauguration of this system that I desire to protest. I believe this measure to be the consummation and not the inauguration of a purpose. There are those in the United States who possess and who profess, for that matter, a superlative contempt for the rule of the plain people, and who despise the voice of a complete democracy. It is that sinister spirit, long held in solution in the body politic, which is precipitated in this bill. Bayonets and bullets may be the prop of a tottering empire, but can never become the bulwark of a free republic. This element does not expect to use the Army of the United States to protect our shores from hostile invasion nor to enforce justice and establish law, but to advance their own sinister and selfish purposes. "Therefore, my Harry, be it thy course to busy giddy minds with foreign quarrels. This action hence borne out may waste the memory of former days."

It is in the hope of "busying giddy minds with foreign quarrels and wasting the memory of former days" and former questions that some gentlemen are so anxious to see this measure become law. [Applause on the Democratic side.] A brave and loyal people will support their government with their bared bosoms. This bill, sir, and this proposed increase in the Army is not intended to be used against the enemies of this country. When justice is established in Cuba, when Porto Rico is admitted as a State of the Union, what, then, will you do with a hundred thousand men? Maintain justice in our own country? God save the mark! Then we shall see every sturdy workman who dares beard corporate greed in its stronghold put down with the bayonet; and that is the ultimate purpose of this measure.

I am no advocate of strikes or lockouts; I am no advocate of a disregard of the law; but I maintain quite seriously that the fact that the rugged independence of American manhood leads its citizens to protest, even if need be by a violation of the law, against the strong arm of oppression is the surest guaranty of the preservation of republican institutions. From them we see our people ready to obey laws wisely created and justly enforced, but equally ready to resist any infringement of their vested rights under whatever guise the unlawful purpose may present itself. Sir, against a great standing army we have both precedent, history, and tradition. In the very cradle of Anglo-Saxon liberty, when our ancestors had assembled upon the historic fields of Runnymede, they were quick to recognize and swift to protest against the evils of a great army. [Loud applause on the Democratic side.]

Our country, formed, in the prodigality of nature, with every advantage of climate and every variety of soil, and a people ambitious alone in the generous rivalry of peace, have elicited the wonder and admiration of mankind. So potential is our example on the nations of the earth that a great people have erected on our shores, as an inspiration to our youth and an example to mankind, the emblem of our national life, lifting aloft, not the sword but the beacon of freedom, justice, and truth.

"It was believed of old that there were some devils easily raised, but never to be laid. In so much that if a magician called them up, he should be forced to find them always some employment; for though they would be of his bidding, yet if he left them but for one moment without some work of evil to perform, they would turn their claws against himself. Such a fiend is an army; they who evoke it can not dismiss it; they are at once its masters and its slaves. Let them not fail to find for it task after task of blood and rapine; let them not leave it for a moment for repose, lest it tear them in pieces."

If we are to become a great military people among the nations of the earth, it is folly to enlist an army one-fifth the size of Germany or France. Limited as is my experience, unripe as is my judgment, I can not conceive how any Representative, controlled alone by love of country, wishes to depart from a system so eminently satisfactory in the past, so certainly safe for the future.

Every soldier is a drone. He earns his bread in the sweat of his neighbor's face. The Army is a class unto itself and, by reason of their training and their associations, out of sympathy with this nation of toilers and workers. The spirit of militarism is the breeder of class distinction; class distinction destroys equality. If this army were needed for purposes of defense or the maintenance of national honor, for the protection of American institutions, I would be eager to assist in its organization; but, sir, its creation is a consummation long devoutly wished by that element of our citizenship which, in my judgment, is the greatest enemy of our country.

Aside from the view that it is unnecessary and impolitic to depart from the ancient custom of our country, the cost of maintaining such an establishment should be reckoned. The people of this country now pay $5 per capita each year for the maintenance of law and order to the Government. The increase of the Army as proposed in this bill will make the cost to the Government $6 per capita.

Gentlemen may say there is no danger of the military becoming dominant, nor do I believe there is now a threatened danger, but if we establish an army of a hundred thousand men this year how long will it be before the demand will be for 200,000, or even 500,000?

It was thought a spirit of such heroic mold that no inclosure could encompass him ruled the world, but an ingenius mortal beguiled him to contract his stature to the compass of a brazen ball and enter it. So soon as the spirit had entered the ball, the mortal at once closed the aperture, and the spirit's power and prestige were gone forever. The civil law, like this huge spirit, overstrides American institutions, and the ingenius individual offering this bill but tempts the supremacy of the civil law with a brazen ball. Let it once enter and the spirit of militarism will forever take its place.

I have no foolish reverence for ancient things, nor do I draw any conclusion from the practice of our Government in the past so convincing as to lead me to oppose this bill. My hostility to the measure is based on broader grounds.

The presence of a great army endangers peace. If we are ready at once to embark in a conflict of arms, we are more prone to take offense; ready to seek a cause of quarrel.

I have thought, sir, that the greatest compliment paid the American people was the sneer of the Europeans that we are a nation of merchants. Had they but said a nation of toilers, we would have worn their damaging characterization as our greatest decoration of honor. What right have we to ask the farmer who, beneath the burning summer sun, with skill and husbandry brings forth the kindly fruits of the earth to contribute of his labor to support and maintain a soldier in ease and plenty? What right have we to ask the artisan who with skilled fingers takes the felled tree and fashions it into the implements of art and luxury, or the mechanic who from his fiery furnace hammers the hot iron into the tools of industry, to contribute of their labor to the support of one whose business it is to live upon the product of his fellow-man?

I have said the ultimate purpose for increasing our Army was to use it against our own people—the present purpose is equally reprehensible. It is proposed to maintain a military government in the Philippine Islands against the wishes and in disregard of the rights of the inhabitants. I know, sir, such a purpose is vigorously denied by many gentlemen on the other side, but occasionally some one has let fall the real truth. I call attention to the remarks of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], chairman of one of the greatest committees of the House and certainly in a position to speak for his party. The other day, debating this very measure, he said:

> Mr. Chairman, we are in the Philippines. We are there under the war power, and will be there under the war power until the treaty is ratified. We have got a navy there; we have got a considerable portion of the Army there, and we are sending more. Gentlemen say, What are you going to do with the Philippines? In my judgment (and I act accordingly and from that standpoint) on the 6th day of February, or, at the furthest, by the 10th day of March next, the treaty with Spain will be ratified, and then we have got to deal with the Philippines. How? We will deal with them by the continuance of a military government there for the present. That is what there is there now, and that is what it will continue, just as it continued in California after we acquired it as a portion of our national territory.

Nor is he alone in expressing such sentiments. The gentleman from Massachusetts, always frank and, like the gentleman from Illinois, also chairman of a great House committee, on the day following the speech of the gentleman from Illinois, said:

> Mr. Chairman, let me say to you that we propose to submit all questions for the consent of the governed, in the Philippines and everywhere else. The important question is, What is "the consent of the governed?" The governed must be competent to give an intelligent consent. There can be no such thing as "consent of the governed" of an individual or of a people that has not sufficient intelligence, culture, and civilization to give a legal "consent." There is not a man on this side of the House or in this country—and I do not strike off the other side of the House—that does not claim as much interest in having "all governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed" in these islands as you do.
> Now, as to the Army, every fact and every consideration presented to this House shows that this Army bill should pass exactly as it is now proposed to pass it. It is in the interest of an efficient army, in the interest of economy. There is not a man on this floor who believes that we can get an intelligent "consent of the governed" from the people in Cuba or Porto Rico or in the Philippines even in three years. Then why not pass this bill and make such an army as we ought to have under existing conditions, and trust to a subsequent Congress to change it whenever they think it wise to change it? Rest assured the most unhappy thing that a conservative President can do is to have a single man more in the Army than is absolutely necessary.

These two extracts from the speeches of two of the most prominent Republicans in the House may be said to fairly represent the intention of the Administration. The purpose, plainly stated, is to conquer the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands and hold that distant territory, not as a State, or a Territory preparing for statehood, but as a military colony, governed by military laws. I can not and do not believe the American people will sanction such a course. That we have the power to subjugate the innocent and ignorant islanders no one will question, but power can never justify murder, nor ignorance rapine, and we will be guilty of murder most foul if we shoot down people who fight in the same cause and for the same objects as did our ancestors at Brandywine, Lexington, and Yorktown.

When we came to establish a government of our own, it was declared as a basic principle "that all governments derive their just power from the consent of the governed," and from that day every question of domestic or foreign policy has been tried by the square and compass of this eternal truth. So fundamental is this principle that it has vitalized the organic law of every people struggling for liberty in modern times. We who declared it are first to violate it. The United States has been the one bright spot to which patriots from every country, in every clime, have turned their eyes—at once the apotheosis and the vindication of liberty. If we do this thing, if we crush this ignorant people with a great army, deny them the right of self-government, we will earn the contempt of men and the curse of God. But those not moved by the moral, let them look to the material aspects of the case.

The Philippine Islands are nearly 8,000 miles from our coast, lying in the Tropics, and inhabited by a barbarous and alien people; they are unfit for a white man to live upon; their shores are visited by the most disastrous storms; their valleys are afflicted with dreadful volcanoes; the people are utterly unfit for citizenship and totally unacquainted with our language, customs, or people. For hundreds of years Spain spent millions in money and thousands of lives in an effort to subjugate them, and after centuries of effort her possessions consist of a few scattered towns that fringe the seacoast.

The bare suggestion of taking the islands calls for a quadrupling of our Army, and if we take them our Navy must be multiplied many times. The revenue derived will never pay the cost of keeping them. Every hill, every valley will become the winding sheet of some brave American youth who has fallen by a savage native's gun or dreadful tropical fever. The possession of these islands carries us at once into the dangerous maelstrom of European politics. Their proximity to China makes the fate of that Kingdom of vital importance to their owner, and every country now striving to gain a portion of Chinese territory will look with ever-increasing jealousy on the possessor of the Philippines.

The present policy of our Government, I believe, portends, sir, nothing but disaster. It is a departure from long-established custom, a disregard of the wisest safeguards of our national life. It is surely impolitic; I believe it disastrous. [Applause.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I tried unsuccessfully to get the attention of the Chair and the chairman of the committee in regard to section No. 6. It provides for an increase of 11 majors. We were told the other day that it was the intention of the Committee on Military Affairs to amend this bill and reduce the number of enlisted men to 50,000, with discretion in the President to increase it, and also to reduce the number of commissioned officers.

It seems to me we ought to have had an opportunity to discuss the bill as well as politics. I am very much interested in the question as to what constitutes a demagogue and the various other things that have been discussed in the debate all day on this bill, but as we have only to-morrow until 3 o'clock before we shall vote upon it there are some very important items that ought to be considered by the House. Instead of 11 majors provided for in section 6, the additional number, I think, should have been captains, and be added the present number.

So in section 7, why not make the additional inspectors captains instead of majors? We are expected to scale this bill down, in order that its expense may not be so great and to make it more acceptable to those who are not satisfied with the bill as a whole. Why not take time to consider these items longer, instead of merely allowing a brief discussion of some political question and then closing debate on the paragraph, leaving the House with no actual information on the paragraph.

I want to know why some of these officers can not properly be put on a lower instead of the higher rank that they are given in this bill. There are a large number of assistant adjutant-generals in the Army filling these places in the volunteer service, with the captain's rank, and we expect to increase the Regular Army, and they will take the place of volunteers. This bill provides for 70 quartermasters of the rank of captain, 37 commissaries of subsistence with the rank of captain. Why not scale down some of these proposed new officers?

Now, they have the rank of captains in the field. They went through the war with Spain, many of them, with that rank. They have always had the rank of captain in the Adjutant-General's Office in the time of war heretofore. I want to know now from the committee the reason why a portion of these staff officers can not be given this lower grade, and thus reduce the expenditures on account of this bill and redeem it of some of those features of objection that some friends of the bill have to it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. LACEY. I yield to the gentleman from Ohio.

Mr. GROSVENOR. During the entire civil war the adjutant and commissary was a lieutenant.

Mr. LACEY. He was a first lieutenant with a regiment, and a captain with a brigade. Now, this bill provides he shall be a major. The bill would provide that from this time on, in time of war as well as in time of peace, he must be a major. Now, it seems to me that this is a place where we could have scaled down and relieved this bill of some of its objectionable features; and I would be glad if the committee would aid us in that respect.

I want to vote for this bill. I would like to have it modified so that I can feel willing to do so, but I would like to have it so modified as to farily meet the approval, at least to some extent, of those gentlemen who are unwilling to vote for a large standing army. We know how difficult it is to get rid of public offices when once created. We had an experience of that kind only a short while ago. Nineteen policemen were put upon the Capitol police force to keep the Capitol from being blown up by Spanish incendiaries during the war. The war closed, and we know that on a yea-and-nay vote we could not get rid of a single one of these policemen. A place once created becomes permanent. It is so whenever there is an increase in the number of the public officers.

Congress is powerless to reduce them, and while as a legal question Congress has unlimited power under the Constitution to create or reduce them, that power to reduce can not be exercised, and the more officers you appoint the more difficult it is to get rid of them, because there are so many more persons who have friends in Congress to defend them. Therefore I think now we ought to be very careful both as to the number and rank of these officers. It is proposed by the gentleman, the chairman of the committee, to reduce the number 300 or 400. I am glad to hear him say that, and I wish he would say where the reduction was to come in, and whether in rank as well as in number. I hope that the bill will be revised into a form that it may receive the substantially united support of those who believe that the Army should be reorganized.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. LACEY. I should like another five minutes.

Mr. HULL. I object to any extension. I said I would in the beginning.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I have said nothing concerning this bill nor of the annexation of the Philippine Islands. I hope that the treaty will be ratified, and that the President will then turn the whole business over to Congress. This is evidently what he intends to do. Meantime, sir, I want to say that at the proper time, if the proper time ever arrives, and it begins to look as if it would not, I propose to offer the following amendment to the bill, which I ask the Clerk to read.

After the word "army," line 5, page 20, insert:

"Provided, That no part of the Army constituted or organized under this bill shall be used for or shall do the duty of a posse comitatus, or be employed in putting down strikes or riots or do any police duty whatever in any State in this Union, except upon the application of the governor of such State to the President, stating that he has not sufficient force to maintain or restore order."

Mr. CUMMINGS. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to add that if the proper time for offering this amendment does not arrive, I give notice that when the vote comes on the final passage of the bill, with the recognition of the Speaker, I shall move to recommit it, with instructions to insert this paragraph.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, before voting on the amendment, I wish to say that the debate so far has had nothing to do with the amendment, and what I shall say has nothing to do with it, but in answer to my colleague from Iowa [Mr. LACEY], who wanted to know why we wanted an increase of officers, I will say that I tried to answer that before; that these two departments, the Adjutant-General's and the Inspector-General's, are purely military, and no man can be put in either of these departments, or bureaus, except from the line of the Army. They are not open to appointments from civil life. They are both now charged with duties that the present force can not discharge, according to the universal testimony of the General of the Army and all the men connected with the Army.

Another thing about the rank—there is not under the present law a single man in the Bureau of the Inspector-General or the Adjutant-General's Department below the rank of major. The men in the field have a lower rank; those serving in regimental organizations are lieutenants. If this bill passes, they will be captains. And this corps, recruited from the line of the Army, are promoted from captains, like Captain Schwan, who has served twenty-nine years in the line and had experience, and who passed through a competitive examination. When they are transferred to the staff, they are given one grade higher than they held.

I want to say that if you do not promote the men one grade, you can not get men to leave the line for the staff. This is not a new departure; it is as old as the Government itself. For that reason the committee followed the universal rule that it had heretofore, and listened to the arguments submitted to show the imperative need of an increase. If you will look at the increase provided by the committee, you will find that it increases only practically the lower grades. In the Adjutant-General's Department it makes one lieutenant-colonel and six majors.

In the Inspector-General's it makes one colonel, two lieutenant-colonels, and six majors to preserve the uniformity and maintain the proportion in the promotion of the men to a higher rank at the different departments and headquarters. You will see that all new men must be appointed to the lowest grade. That is the reason, and I am opposed to any amendment. Now, if there is no gentleman who wants to offer an amendment, I move that all debate be closed upon the section and the amendment.

The motion was agreed to.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the Judge-Advocate-General's Department shall consist of 1 Judge-Advocate-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; 5 assistant judge-advocates-general, with the rank of colonel; 4 deputy judge-advocates-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, and 4 judge-advocates, with the rank of major, and in all other respects the organization of said Department shall be that provided in the act of Congress approved July 5, 1884: Provided, That the vacancies hereby created or caused shall be filled, as far as practicable, by the promotion, according to seniority, and officers so promoted shall rank all other officers of same grade not so promoted, of officers of the Judge-Advocate-General's Department: Provided further, That persons who have served in the Volunteer Army in the war with Spain, and persons in civil life, may be appointed to positions in the Judge-Advocate-General's Department, but no such person shall be appointed after he shall have reached the age of 50 years: And provided further, That the professor of law at the United States Military Academy shall be detailed from the Judge-Advocate-General's Department, and (if of rank inferior to that of colonel) shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of colonel when he shall have served ten years in said Department, or in said Department and as professor of law at the United States Military Academy together; and otherwise he shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of lieutenant-colonel, if of rank inferior thereto.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to amend the committee amendment where it proposes to strike out "five," in line 12, and insert "two;" but it can be reached by asking the House not to adopt the committee amendment, leaving it as it is in the bill, with only two assistant judge-advocates-general with the rank of colonel.

The first committee amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on the amendment recommended by the committee, in line 13, to strike out "five" and insert "four."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next question is on the amendment to insert in line 19, after the word "created," the words "or caused."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "seniority," in the twentieth line, insert "and officers so promoted shall rank all other officers of same grade not so promoted."

Mr. HULL. I yield to the gentleman from Wisconsin [Mr. GRIFFIN] to offer an amendment.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I offer as a substitute for the entire proviso the following, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the first proviso, section 8, page 9, so as to read as follows:

"Provided, that the vacancies hereby created or caused shall be filled as far as practicable by the promotion according to seniority of officers of the Judge-Advocate-General's Department, and officers so promoted shall rank all other officers of same grade not so promoted."

Mr. GRIFFIN. The necessity, Mr. Chairman, of offering this substitute for a proviso grows out of the fact that an error was made in drawing the amendment originally. It was transposed so that according to the arrangement of the bill it is in an improper place, and this substitute answers the purpose.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment as amended.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 24, section 8, strike out the words "officers of the Judge-Advocate-General's Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question now is on agreeing to the amendment recommended by the committee in section 8, page 10, line 4, striking out the word "thirty" and inserting "fifty."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 4, page 10, after the word "of," strike out the word "fifty" and insert the words "thirty-five" and add the words "and such persons prior to appointment shall be examined as to their moral, mental, and physical fitness for such position."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I make the point of order that we have just stricken out the word "thirty" and inserted "fifty."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa makes the point that this is an amendment to an amendment already agreed to. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 19, page 9, after the word "filled," insert the following: "as now prescribed by law."

Mr. HULL. We have stricken out that proviso and adopted a substitute for it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair so understands. Does the gentleman make a point of order upon the amendment?

Mr. HULL. I do.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair sustains the point of order.

Mr. SIMPSON. Has all this provision with regard to recruiting officers from civil life been stricken out?

Mr. HULL. We have stricken out all that proviso, and a substitute has been adopted for it—the substitute offered by the gentleman from Wisconsin.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I offer my amendment to the substitute.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute having been already adopted, it is impossible for the Committee of the Whole now to adopt an amendment to it.

The Clerk read the next section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 9. That the Quartermaster's Department shall consist of 1 Quartermaster-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; 10 assistant quartermasters-general, with the rank of colonel; 15 deputy quartermasters-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; 25 quartermasters, with the rank of major; 70 assistant quartermasters, with the rank of captain, mounted; the military storekeeper, now provided for by law, and 150 post quartermaster-sergeants: Provided, That all vacancies in the grade of colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion, according to seniority, as now prescribed by law: And provided further, That persons who have served as officers of the Quartermaster's Department in the Volunteer Army in the war with Spain, and persons in civil life, may be appointed to positions in the grade of captain created by this section; and such persons, prior to appointment, shall be examined as to their physical fitness for service only; but no such person shall be appointed to the grade of captain after he shall have reached the age of 30 years.

Upon the death, retirement, or other separation from active service of the military storekeeper now in service, the office of military storekeeper shall cease to exist.

The first amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 15, page 10, strike out "ten" and insert "eight;" so as to read: "eight assistant quartermasters-general."

Mr. HULL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "eight" and inserting "six."

Mr. HULL'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was adopted.

The next amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 16 strike out the word "fifteen" and insert "sixteen;" so as to read "sixteen deputy quartermasters-general."

Mr. HULL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "sixteen" and inserting "twelve."

Mr. HULL'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was adopted.

The next amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 17 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "twenty-six;" so as to read "twenty-six quartermasters."

Mr. HULL. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "twenty-six" and inserting "twenty."

Mr. HULL'S amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was adopted.

Mr. HULL. I move to amend by striking out in line 18 the word "seventy" and inserting "fifty;" so as to read "fifty assistant quartermasters."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In lines 25 and 26 strike out the words "as officers of the Quartermaster's Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

On page 11, in line 6, strike out the word "thirty" and insert "fifty;" so as to read: "no such person shall be appointed to the grade of captain after he shall have reached the age of 50 years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I wish to make an inquiry of the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs. I find in the last paragraph of this section a provision that the office of military storekeeper shall be abolished or shall cease to exist upon the death or retirement of the present occupant of that office. Is that the position that was created for the doorkeeper of the President at the last session?

Mr. HULL. Yes, sir.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Has the appointee ever performed any service as military storekeeper?

Mr. HULL. I have not made any inquiry on that point. The gentleman from California [Mr. MAGUIRE], by addressing a letter to the War Department, can find out.

Mr. MAHON. I move to amend by inserting before the word "physical," in line 4 of page 11, the words "moral, mental, and;" so as to read, "shall be examined as to their moral, mental, and physical fitness for service."

Mr. HULL. I hope that amendment will not be adopted. We had that matter under consideration in committee for a long time.

Mr. MARSH. I hope this amendment will not be adopted. It is not likely that the President of the United States will send to the Senate the name of an immoral person for a position on the staff. This amendment proposes to require that an examining board shall pass upon the mental and moral, as well as the physical qualifications of a man whom the President has selected for appointment. I think the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] will on reflection withdraw the amendment. This feature of the bill was very fully discussed in the committee, and their conclusion was to leave the provision as it stands.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, the President can not always ascertain the mental, moral, and physical fitness of a man whom he proposes for appointment. Very often he may be imposed upon by information given to him that men are fitted for places of this kind when in fact they are not. The examination required by law for promotions in the Regular Army and for the appointment of boys to West Point or Annapolis embrace mental and moral fitness. Why, Mr. Chairman, a well-bred horse offered at auction can stand a first-class physical examination. If it were possible for the President, in making his selections from all over this broad country, to know personally the mental and moral fitness of men to occupy places as commissioned officers of the Regular Army, I should be perfectly willing to leave the matter to the President of any party. But he can not.

What is the objection to the amendment? I contend that no man should hold a position in the Army of the United States unless he can pass a moral, mental, and physical examination. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. MARSH. Will the gentleman allow me a moment?

Mr. MAHON. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. In your amendment the President nominates a man to the Senate, and he is confirmed or rejected by that body, but you require that he shall go before a board to pass an examination as to his mental and moral qualifications. Now, that seems to me to be asking a little too much.

Mr. MAHON. Not at all. The mental examination is certainly necessary for a man in the Regular Army. Why should it not be made applicable to a man coming from private life who goes into the same service?

Mr. HULL. The same would apply to both of these appointments, either from civil or military life. The physical powers of a man to discharge the duties may not be known either to the President or the Senate. But if the man to be examined is of bad moral character and mentally unfit for the position, it seems to me that there is always somebody who will give the President information, or the information will be reached in some way, so as to prevent such an appointment.

Now in the case of postmasters——

Mr. MARSH. Allow me to interrupt my friend on the committee for a moment.

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. MARSH. This is giving to a board of three officers a veto power upon the action of the President and the Senate of the United States.

Mr. HULL. That is correct.

Mr. MAHON. But that is not an answer to the suggestion I make. If men in the Regular Army are to pass these examinations in order to determine their capacity to command men, certainly it ought not to be considered a hardship or an injustice to require men appointed from civil life to pass the same examination.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it will make it a stronger feature in the bill. It would, in other words, strengthen the bill. It will give it additional power, and commend it to the people of the country. It is a proposition that will satisfy both sides of the House, and indicates the fact that there are no political jobs in the bill, and no "places" for men of any political party, who will be enabled to get into office through the medium of the bill.

We know, as a matter of fact, that during the late war—the war with Spain—that many appointments were made which if proper care had been taken or opportunity given for investigation would not have been made. It has been stated, and no doubt truthfully, that a great many persons, gamblers, drunkards, worthless, shiftless fellows, were appointed simply because of the fact that they had some one to reach the ear of the President, and got a commission from him under what might be said to be false pretenses. [Applause.]

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to guard against just that state of things. There is no necessity for it. Some of these men are in to-day; and there is an effort made to keep them in. If they can not stand a physical examination, or a moral examination, I hope the House will consent that such people should not be permitted to remain in the service longer. I have nobody in my own mind. I do not strike at any man. It is true that one man got in from my own district. Not on my recommendation; but he got there by chance——

Mr. HENDERSON. What is his "brand?" [Laughter.]

Mr. MAHON. A man who is no more fitted for the position he occupies than the devil would be to preside over a church meeting. [Laughter.] He got in in some way; but how, I do not know how. Certainly not by my consent. [Laughter and applause.]

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I have an amendment prepared which I desire to offer, which covers a little more than the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania. I will submit it now, to be read as a substitute for his amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting between the words "physical" and "fitness," in line 4, on page 11 of the bill, the following words:
"Mentally, educationally, and morally;" and by striking out the word "only" in the same line.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Mr. Chairman, I believe this is merely the same as the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], if I heard correctly the reading of that one, with the exception that it includes also educational qualifications. And I am at a loss to understand what objection there really can be either to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania or to what has just been read from the Clerk's desk.

Mr. MAHON. Will the gentleman from Missouri allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. DE ARMOND. Certainly.

Mr. MAHON. I inserted the word "mental," because that is the term used concerning the examinations both at Annapolis and West Point. The word has a well-defined meaning, and includes a thorough educational examination.

Mr. DE ARMOND. Very likely, then, both amount to the same thing. If so, I do not wish to press the substitute. Let the substitute be withdrawn.

Mr. Chairman, what can be the objection to an examination to ascertain really the fitness of the person to be appointed? What is the use of a physical examination to the exclusion of all other examination? If there are to be appointed men lacking mental and moral qualities for the office, it is better that they should be decrepit, so that soon they will pass from the positions which they never ought to have, than that they should be strong and vigorous physically and thus likely long hold and long disgrace them. An examination, to be worth anything, must be one which inquires into the abilities and the qualifications required for a proper discharge of the duties of the office to be filled.

Physical ability is the smallest part of the essential qualifications. For one of these places the mental and moral qualities are the vital things. A man weak and feeble in physique, but strong mentally and morally, would be infinitely more valuable in a place of trust than a giant, a physical athlete, deficient mentally or wanting morally.

There is a reason, perhaps, for the committee action, and it ought to be explained here and now. It seems to me very strange that an examination is required to ascertain a man's physical fitness, but no requirement is made or question raised as to his mental or moral qualifications. A man in one of these high places ought to possess sufficient mentality and sufficient education, and be upright and clean.

He ought to be a gentleman in office, a gentleman before he goes into office, and a gentleman after he retires from office. What the objection can be to an examination which will ascertain whether one proposed or proposing himself for these important places is of that character, I can not imagine.

It seems to me it is incumbent upon the committee for its own sake, incumbent individually upon each member of the committee who favors this most peculiar examination as to "physical fitness for service only," to give some reason why this discrimination is made in favor of physical vigor and against mental and moral manhood, why an athlete or a bully should be qualified for appointment, while gentlemen less robust are to be excluded, to the great detriment of the service. Really, as one seeking information, and believing that I express what is in the minds of many, I would like to learn what reason or excuse or apology the committee can have for this discrimination.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment offered by the gentleman from Missouri will be considered as withdrawn.

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I had not thought to speak on any question growing out of this debate. I must confess, however, to an intense conviction that I can not return with honest heart and satisfied conscience to the good, the brave, and the true in my beloved State unless I, at least in a feeble way, speak a word for what I think is right.

I want it known here in this Hall and throughout the country, and by the sons and daughters of Indiana everywhere, that the voice of that magnificent Commonwealth is not the voice of pessimism and detraction. [Applause.] I want it known that that voice to-day, at this hour, and in this crisis, as in the days of Lane and Morton and Colfax and McDonald, is the voice of inspiring hope and stalwart patriotism. [Applause.]

Mr. Chairman, I believe I know the people of Indiana. It has not been two years since I met them and learned their minds. It has been recently; and were I uncertain now as to their attitude on any question of great importance to this Republic I would not seek the ocean, far, far from home, where fashion sports and torpid natures flock, but I would go home and, face to face, greet and speak to those whose trust I claim to guard. [Applause.] Driven from intrenchment to intrenchment, put to utter rout by precedent, by tradition, by history, and by masterful logic, the opponents of this bill claim that it should die because of liberty; that liberty demands that we withdraw from the eastern sea.

Mr. Chairman, never since Yorktown has liberty ever for an instant felt called upon to issue an injunction against the American Republic. [Applause on the Republican side.] Gentlemen on the other side of this Chamber are in error. Liberty does not speak through the voice of Aguinaldo any more than the people of Indiana speak through the voice of the distinguished gentleman from the Sixth district of that State. [Renewed applause on the Republican side.]

Rather does liberty speak through that great captain of ours on the eastern sea, and through him she implores us to remain. She begs us to remain because she sees greedy nations looking on. She begs us to remain because she sees Asia in terror, Africa and the islands of the sea despoiled. Should our ships sail away, vessels of other nations would land their soldiers, and their mighty guns would frown budding hope to death. [Applause.] They tried to do this even while our flag was there, and nothing but heroic warning held them back.

Mr. Chairman, on behalf of human liberty, I contend that we should remain in the Philippine Islands. [Loud applause on the Republican side.]

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. SHATTUC. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more time.

Mr. HAY. I object.

Mr. LANDIS. I should like to know who objected?

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made by the gentleman from Virginia.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this paragraph is exhausted.

Mr. SIMPSON. I move to strike out the last word.

This section that we now have under discussion differs from the other section inasmuch as it provides for recruiting officers from civil life. I understood a substitute was offered for section 8, and that it passed. Now, this section, section 9, still provides that these officers can or may be recruited from civil life.

Mr. Chairman, that is one of the difficulties we labored under during the late war with Spain. To my mind a great many of the evils that crept into the service connected with the Army were due to the fact that so many incompetent men were appointed to responsible positions, and I am glad to see the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], in a lucid interval, bringing the attention of the committee to that fact. [Laughter.]

I also bring your attention to the fact that it elicited no applause from the Republican side. [Laughter and applause on the Democratic side.] Now, what does this mean? It means that you can go into civil life, if, as the gentlemen from Pennsylvania suggests, you have sufficient political pull, and appoint some fellow, the smug son of a rich father, some son of a bloated bondholder, who has not demonstrated he has sense enough to keep the money his father stole and has shown himself to be incapable of performing any business. This man can get him into the Army and get him made a lieutenant-colonel.

Now, I do not say that the gentleman from Iowa would do anything of that kind. But take the chairman of this committee himself as an example. He has a son who served a short time in the last war. Now, if he could bring political influence to bear he could have him appointed—of course the gentleman from Iowa would not—a lieutenant-colonel, with all that implies. What is this for?

To furnish positions for some incompetents that have no qualifications for the responsibility, and are only fit to put on exhibition the uniforms of the latest style and to stand as samples and display the latest military millinery of American regimentals. [Laughter and applause.] That is what it means, and that is to be done at the expense of the people.

Now, I say this section ought to be amended so as to read the same as the rest, so as to provide for an increase of the officers from the rank of those competent to fill the positions. The country goes to great expense every year, and we were increasing the number just a few days ago of 120 at West Point. We are spending large sums to educate officers to fill these positions.

For about four years they undergo the most rigid military discipline and education, and we ought to recruit the Army in this way, giving it to men who come from that branch of the service instead of going over the country and looking up a lot of incompetents to fill these places because it affords an opportunity to provide places for a lot of lame ducks of the Republican party. Therefore, I hope and think the bill ought to be amended so as to make this next section agree with the rest. I hope the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. HULL. I move that all debate upon the pending section and amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MAHON and Mr. HAY. Division!

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 113, noes 30.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. VINCENT. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment to this section.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 9, strike out all of line 7 and all of line 8, except the word "the" at the end of the line.

Add at the end of the section the words: "Upon the passage of this bill."

Mr. VINCENT. Mr. Chairman, I believe this section provides——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is closed on this section and all amendments.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. VINCENT. Division, Mr. Chairman.

The House divided; and there were—ayes 49, noes 86.

So the amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 10. That the Subsistence Department shall consist of 1 Commissary-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; 4 assistant commissaries-general, with the rank of colonel; 6 deputy commissaries-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; 10 commissaries, with the rank of major; 27 assistant commissaries, with the rank of captain, and 160 commissary-sergeants, who shall hereafter be known as post commissary-sergeants: Provided, That all vacancies in the grades of colonel and lieutenant-colonel created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion, according to seniority, as now prescribed by law: And provided further, That persons who have served as officers of the Subsistence Department in the Volunteer Army in the war with Spain, and persons in civil life, may be appointed to positions in the grades of major and captain created by this section; and such persons, prior to appointment, shall be examined as to their physical fitness for service only; but no such person shall be appointed to the grade of major after he shall have reached the age of 35 years, nor to the grade of captain after he shall have reached the age of 30 years.

The first amendment recommended by the committee was read, as follows:

In section 10, line 13, strike out "six" and insert "eight;" so that it will read "eight deputy commissaries-general," etc.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa has the floor.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I would like to have the amendment reported again.

The amendment was again reported.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend that by striking out "eight" and inserting "five."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask to go back to line 12 and strike out the word "four" and insert "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The next question is on the amendment recommended by the committee, in line 14 strike out "ten" and insert "twelve."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "twelve" and inserting "eight."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 15, strike out the words "twenty-seven" and insert the words "thirty-seven."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment by striking out "thirty-seven" and inserting "twenty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. In line 16, I move to insert the word "mounted" after the word "captain."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. In line 19, I move to insert after the words "lieutenant-colonels" the words "or major."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next amendment recommended by the committee.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 22, section 10, strike out the words "as officers of the Subsistence Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, section 10, in lines 2 and 3, strike out the words "thirty-five" and insert "fifty."

Mr. MAHON. I move to amend by striking out "fifty" and inserting "thirty-five."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, we have agreed to fifty all the way along.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that that amendment is not in order. The gentleman can attain the same object by having the committee vote down the committee amendment.

Mr. MAHON. Then, Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by inserting "thirty" instead of "fifty." I want the chairman of the committee to understand that I am not captious about offering these amendments. You name men from civil life at 50 years of age, and it is safe to say that at least one-half of these men—if we are to determine this matter by the frailties of our bodies—that one-half of these men, if no more, after they have been put into the Regular Army at the age of 50, when they have crossed the meridian of life and are on the downward side, will be on the retired list of the Army in less than five years from date of their appointment.

Several MEMBERS. Make it 40 years.

Mr. MAHON. I want some reason from the gentleman who has offered the amendment to change it from 35 years to 50 why men of this age shall be taken from civil life and commissioned in the Regular Army, men who have never had during their younger years the training to command men, who never have had the exposure of camp life to harden and toughen them——

Mr. MARSH. Let me say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that commissaries do not command men.

Mr. MAHON. That does not make any difference. During the war we had an Inspector-General's Bureau, and they came to Congress asking for more help to look after the camp and those deadly diseases that follow every new army.

Inexperienced men from the department are sent to these encampments, as they were in Cuba. That department was left in the hands of inexperienced men, and I would rather blame the mistake for the deaths that followed from typhoid and other fevers to that fact. I am satisfied that if it was investigated, that if these men who should have remained in Washington had looked after the camps it would have been far better. Gentlemen say this is the Commissary Department. Well, in a time of war they can be called into the field. That is not the question. Tell me if there is a man on the floor of this House who thinks that we should take men from civil life and put them into the Regular Army to do the dangerous work of a soldier in camp or on the battlefield at the age of 50 years. I am one of the men who, if a man has served his country well and has reached the age of 64, am willing to retire him, to place him on the retired list; but as long as I have a voice or a vote in this House I will not vote for any part of this bill that would take a man at the age of 50 and put him into the Regular Army and in less than five years put him on the retired list.

Does the gentleman tell me that service for five years or six years or ten years should entitle a man to go on that roll of honor? I hope this House will vote to reduce this age limit and make it 35. If that is satisfactory to the committee, I will not object.

Mr. HULL. Make it 40.

Mr. MAHON. Well, I will not object to 40, because then the appointee can have twenty-four years of service before retirement. Mr. Chairman, I ask to modify my amendment so as to insert 40.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the modification of the amendment? The Chair hears none.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me particularly unfair to fix a different age limit in the Commissary Department from that which is fixed in the Quartermaster's Department.

Mr. MAHON. That other was worked through on a substitute; and I trust it will be changed.

Mr. HULL. The Committee of the Whole can not reconsider its action.

If this House chooses to adopt one rule for the Commissary Department and another for the Quartermaster's Department, I have no objection individually; but I want to say that the original bill prescribed as an age limit for these positions 30 or 35 years. The committee believed that in the Commissary and Quartermaster's Departments, where the officers go in as captains, 30 or 35 years would be too young an age. Finally it was fixed at 50; and that is the limit agreed upon by the Committee of the Whole for the Quartermaster's Department and the Judge-Advocate-General's Department.

A MEMBER. That can be changed.

Mr. HULL. It can not be changed. In order to be consistent in its action, I hope that the House will sustain the committee and preserve the same age limit for these different and equal departments.

Mr. MAHON. If the House should decide to fix the age limit in this case at 40, the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs can easily ask unanimous consent to have the other portion of the bill made uniform.

A MEMBER. We can reconsider our action.

Mr. HULL. There is no reconsideration in Committee of the Whole.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. MAHON to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty," it was agreed to; and the amendment of the committee as thus amended was agreed to.

The next amendment of the committee was read, as follows:

In line 4 strike out "thirty" and insert "fifty."

Mr. MAHON. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "fifty" and inserting "forty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to; and the amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. MAHON. In order to make the bill uniform, I move to amend by inserting after the word "their," in line 16, page 11, the words "moral, mental, and;" so as to read "moral, mental, and physical fitness for service only."

Mr. HULL. The word "only" ought to be stricken out if this amendment is made. That will make our present action harmonious with what was done in reference to the Quartermaster's Department.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I move the amendment which I send to the desk.

Insert after line 4, page 12, the following:

"And provided further, That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bar tender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States."

Mr. HULL. I raise a point of order on the amendment. We are now dealing with provisions which have reference to the several departments. This amendment applies to the regulation of the Army. If it should come in at all, it should be as a separate and independent section.

A MEMBER. What is the amendment?

Mr. HULL. Its object, as I understand, is to abolish canteens.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is made that this amendment is not germane to the section. The Chair will hear the gentleman from North Dakota [Mr. JOHNSON] on the amendment.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana addressed the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota is on the floor upon a point of order.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I hope I shall get it some time.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. This is certainly a very proper matter for deliberation and decision on the part of Congress. The amendment embraces a provision which should come in somewhere in this bill, and on looking over the bill I have found no section where it would be more appropriate than here.

Mr. TAWNEY. Bring it in as a separate section.

Mr. HULL. It should come in after the provisions for the staff have been completed. It belongs to the general provisions for the Army.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. With that understanding, I am perfectly satisfied to have the amendment printed, so that members of the House may read it——

Mr. HULL. I will not raise a point of order upon it when it comes in at the proper place.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from North Dakota withdraws his amendment and that it is to be printed in the RECORD for information.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. With the agreement that the point of order is not to be raised.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. HULL. I move that all debate on this section and amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. For what purpose does the gentleman from Indiana rise?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. To a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] rose in his place a bit ago, and repeated with great deliberation what was evidently the exordium of a carefully prepared and committed speech, the balance of which, I suppose, will appear in the RECORD to-morrow morning, under the liberality of the House, which will enable him, even under the five-minute rule of debate, to "extend his remarks" in the RECORD.

He made use, during the expression of his sentiments, of the following remark, which was in the nature of an exceeding surprise to me, inasmuch as I had supposed that my personal relations with him were kindly, and I could not remember of anything that I had ever said or had ever done since I have been in Congress that could even by the remotest possibility have been construed by him into an act of unfriendliness toward him.

In order that I might not do any injustice to him or make any mistake, I sought the reporter and got exactly the language which was used. I was desirous of seeing, sir, whether in some manner I had misunderstood or misconstrued the words which were uttered by my colleague. I find, however, the following to be his language:

Mr. Chairman, I believe I know the people of Indiana. It has not been two years since I met them and learned their minds. It has been recently; and were I uncertain now as to their attitude on any question of great importance to this Republic, I would not now seek the ocean, far, far from home where fashion sports and torpid natures flock, but I would go home and face to face greet and speak to those whose trust I claim to guard.

Did the gentleman from Indiana refer to the fact that I have not been at home for the past two years?

Mr. KNOX. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. KNOX. The gentleman from Indiana is not stating, or has not stated up to this time, a question of personal privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. There is an unkind, an ungenerous, and an untruthful implication contained in this language, and it was used, too, when the gentleman from Indiana found that I had failed, as I did on several occasions, to get the floor this afternoon, although I tried repeatedly to do so, and under the impression that I would not be able to reply to his unjust insinuations.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana has not stated a question of privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Why, Mr. Chairman, the implication conveyed by the gentleman's remarks that I misrepresent my constituents, and that I have avoided them and refuse to go home to face them, certainly entitles me to a hearing and to an explanation on the floor of the House. Now, if it does not raise a question of privilege to impugn a man's motives in this connection, I do not know what constitutes a question of privilege.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman allow the Chair to make one statement?

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I certainly will.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair wishes to say that so far he has not understood the gentleman from Indiana to state a question of personal privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana (speaking at the same time). I understood the Chair to ask me to state the question of personal privilege. I was answering the Chair.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Indiana allow the Chair to make a statement? The Chair would state that so far the gentleman does not disclose any question of personal privilege.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Now, I will say to the Chair that in what I said just before the Chair made that observation, when the Chair was rapping so vigorously to stop me, as the Chair has done repeatedly to-day, I was answering the question which I understood the Chair had previously addressed to me as to what there was in this that constituted a question of privilege. Now, it is a singular condition of affairs if a man representing the views that I do upon this floor must sit here a whole day and hear gentlemen assail him and impugn his motives and not be heard in his own defense.

It has been done over and over again here during this debate, and gentlemen have been all the more emboldened because they saw it was utterly impossible for me to gain the floor in order to take part in this discussion. I do not intend to say anything personal about the gentleman, but I do intend to repel, once and for all, personal charges that have been made against me here upon this floor, and I think now it is proper that I should be allowed to proceed. I want to say to the gentleman [Mr. LANDIS] that I recognize the fact that the people of Indiana are not pessimists, but I recognize the further fact that all over that great State——

Mr. CANNON. I rise to a question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state his question of order.

Mr. CANNON. It seems to me the gentleman is not addressing himself to a question of personal privilege. Now, I am quite content that by unanimous consent he shall take his five minutes, and it seems to me in fairness if any other member wants five minutes to reply to the gentleman from Indiana that he should have it.

Mr. GAINES. Make it ten.

Mr. CANNON. But it is not a question of privilege and ought not to be presented before the House as such.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I do not care on what ground I get the floor, if I am allowed to proceed.

Mr. CANNON. I make the point of order that a question of privilege has not been disclosed.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is quite ready to decide that point. The gentleman from Indiana has stated no question of personal privilege whatever.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Then I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to proceed——

Mr. BERRY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman may be allowed to proceed for ten minutes.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Indiana may proceed—for how long?

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman whom he is replying to had only five minutes, and prompt objection was made to the extension of his time.

The CHAIRMAN. Unanimous consent is asked that the gentleman from Indiana be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

Mr. GAINES and others. Ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SHATTUC. If the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] is to have ten minutes, too, then I do not object.

The CHAIRMAN. The proposition is that the gentleman from Indiana be allowed to proceed for five minutes.

Several MEMBERS. Ten minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection?

Mr. SHATTUC. Yes; I object, unless his colleague has ten minutes. If he can have that, all right. The gentleman [Mr. JOHNSON] has held the floor here——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. It is not necessary for the gentleman from Ohio to make reflections upon me, for I have not held the floor this afternoon, as he is well aware.

Mr. SHATTUC. If Mr. LANDIS can have ten minutes, I will not object.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. He can have ten hours for aught I care. I simply do not want to leave uncontradicted in the RECORD the charge against me that I have been derelict in my duty and been absent from my home and constituents unnecessarily, unwilling to face them, and unable to know their sentiments.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio object?

Mr. SHATTUC. Not if his colleague is allowed an equal time.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection. The gentleman from Indiana.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Now, the charge made against me here is that I have, without good cause, avoided my district; that I do not know the feelings, and that I am misrepresenting the sentiments of my people. There is not one word of truth in this, and the gentleman, on reflection, if he is a manly man, will disavow any wrongful intent in uttering it.

I have not been home to my district for nearly two years, and there has scarcely been a day during that time that I have been able to breathe without pain. The condition of my health has been of such a character that I have at times been compelled to take to bed and remain there for a considerable time. I have been obliged to seek the benefit of the ocean and mountain air under the advice of one of the best specialists of the country in these cases. I have been under the care of a physician nearly all of the time.

I have spent my time there and here for two years, and it has simply been a question of my health that has influenced my location. All that gentlemen on the floor have heard is that my health was impaired. It certainly has not been necessary that I should describe my malady, nor would I have thus referred to it but for the gentleman's unwarranted attack upon me. I could have no motive on earth to keep me away from my constituents. There has never been a minute when I have been unwilling to face them, when it would not have been a pleasure for me to do so.

A royal welcome awaits me there whenever I go back. Men may differ from me there in opinion, but they have always treated me kindly. I have been prosecuting attorney of my county for two terms, represented my county in the State senate, and for my first term in Congress was nominated over one of the most magnificent lawyers and best citizens of eastern Indiana, as the gentleman from Indiana knows. I received after that two unanimous nominations; and, as the gentleman further knows, I made the fight last time for my nomination against one of his friends, where there was used against me a large amount of money, promises of office, and, indeed, every base instrumentality to which men could resort for the purpose of defeating me, and where, as the gentleman still further knows, I made myself a clean, manly, honorable fight, without using a single illegitimate weapon against my opponent, and got a majority of the unpurchased and unpurchasable vote of the county of Henry, on which the contest hinged, and was triumphantly reelected to this House. It is known in the district that I desired four years ago not to make the race for Congress.

But the gentleman's friend, who had defeated Judge Holman in one of those political upheavals that occur sometimes in Indiana, insultingly challenged me to the race. It was a well-known fact in my district, and I believe the gentleman is aware of it also, that I said at the time of this race that I would never again be a candidate for Congress. I was anxious to retire in order that I might resume again the practice of an honorable profession. And I could go back to the county of Wayne, where I live, to-day and be received there on all hands with kindness, both by those who believe as I do in politics and by those who do not agree with me in politics.

I can say, too, without any egotism, that I could command there almost one side on every important lawsuit in the county during my absence from my district. Why, then, should I be unwilling, sir, to face my people? I have been in constant communication with my constituents, and have known their sentiments and endeavored to serve them faithfully. The gentleman can speak for his district, and I will speak for mine. I know what the sentiment of my people is, and while I am aware that those who talk the loudest and are most prominent in the control of politics are probably in favor of the policy of this Administration and of the expansion of territory, yet that the masses of the people are not in favor of the forcible annexation of the Philippines and do not believe with the gentleman that we would advance the cause of liberty by seizing upon these islands over the protests of their people and denying them the right to govern themselves.

All over my district there are thoughtful and intelligent people, people of all shades of political opinion, who feel that we stand in troublesome times, that there are great difficulties before us with respect to the Philippine Islands, and who have no wish to colonize them or to do them wrong. Again, the gentleman tells me that on this public question I do not reflect public opinion.

I do not believe, sir, that the Representative is the slave of the people. It is fair to presume that those who elect him have some confidence in his intelligence, his integrity, and his judgment, while he is expected, generally speaking, to represent them, yet it is necessary that he should have a fair latitude for individual opinion. This has always been the sentiment by which I have guided my political life in my Congressional career. Whenever I have made up my mind on a subject, whatever might be my conclusion, I have never cared to find out whether my political views were popular, so I felt that they were right, nor do I care to change my opinion now to please a gentleman who makes war upon me only in order to try to kick himself into notoriety by making a base attack upon a man whose fame is above his reach. [Applause.]

Mr. LANDIS. Mr. Chairman, I confess that it is with some degree of hesitancy that I arise to reply to the distinguished gentleman from the Sixth Congressional district of Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON], because in his closing remarks he states that his fame is above my reach.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is an admission.

Mr. LANDIS. I presume that is so, because he admits it is so. [Laughter.] It reminds me of the challenge the gentleman made a year ago when I attempted to interrupt him, and he brushed me off by saying that for him to recognize me would be much like a giant recognizing a pigmy. Mr. Chairman, think of a giant going to the seashore for his health. [Laughter.] Taking into consideration the fact that the gentleman claims to be a giant, I can not understand why he should think the language I used in my opening remarks referred to him, because certainly——

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Did the gentleman not refer to me?

Mr. LANDIS. The distinguished gentleman complains that he has not had any time in this debate. He has consumed more time in this debate than any other one man in this House, and he has consumed it against the desire and the will of a great many members of this House, who did not care to interfere with the gentleman's remarks.

I did not in my remarks intend to say anything personal against the gentleman from Indiana. I did start out to address a few remarks to this House in which I intended to convey the impression that the distinguished gentleman, in all the remarks he has made, has not reflected the sentiment of the people of his State, and should he return there and mingle among the people he would learn as much. He misrepresents them; he has not been in a position to understand what they want or what their feelings are upon these great questions in this great crisis.

I have received letters myself from friends who did all in their power to send the distinguished gentleman to Congress this last time, in which they asked me if some member of the Indiana delegation had not the courage to rise and state to this House and to announce to the country that the distinguished gentleman is not representing the Republican party, and, as far as that is concerned, the Democratic party, in the State of Indiana on this question.

I would say more, that the leading newspaper in our State, all the Republican newspapers in our State, and a great many of the most influential Democratic newspapers in Indiana are diametrically opposed to the sentiments advanced by my distinguished colleague, and he would learn this if he would go out among the people. I did not know he was kept away on account of his health; but you seem to have good health when you get on the floor of the House; you seem to have health enough to make trouble for your party and trouble for the President of the United States. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] should not address his colleague in the second person.

Mr. LANDIS. The distinguished gentleman seems to be stalwart enough when it comes to arraigning the President of the United States and the party that elected him to a seat on the floor of this House. It strikes me that a man that can consume as much time as the distinguished gentleman from Indiana has consumed in misrepresenting his party, in assailing his President, applying to him epithets, and referring to him by insinuation in a way that Aguinaldo would scarcely do, ought to find enough time to at least spend a few days or a few weeks with his people and really ascertain what they think upon great public questions. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 11. That the Medical Department shall consist of 1 Surgeon-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; 10 surgeons, with the rank of colonel; 20 surgeons, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; 110 surgeons, with the rank of major; 300 assistant surgeons, with the rank of captain or first lieutenant; and a hospital corps, consisting of 250 hospital sergeants, who shall have the pay and allowances of hospital stewards; 100 pharmacists, with a compensation of $40 per month and the allowances of acting hospital stewards; 400 hospital corporals, with the pay and allowances of acting hospital stewards, and 3,000 privates: Provided, That all vacancies in the grades of colonel, lieutenant-colonel, and major created or caused by this section shall, as far as practicable, and subject to the prescribed examination, be filled by promotion according to seniority, as now provided by law: Provided also, That assistant surgeons shall have the rank of first lieutenant for the first five years' service, and that of captain after five years' service, subject to the examination now required by law: And provided further, That the period during which any assistant surgeon shall have served as a medical officer of the Volunteer Army during the war with Spain shall be counted as a portion of the five years' service required to entitle him to the rank of captain: Provided further, That all vacancies in grade of assistant surgeons shall be filled by competitive examinations, as now provided by law.

Acting assistant surgeons may be appointed by the Surgeon-General, with the sanction of the Secretary of War and under such regulations as may be prescribed by him, for temporary service whenever imperatively necessary, at a compensation not to exceed $150 per month: Provided, That no one shall be so appointed until he shall have passed a satisfactory professional examination.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the first committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 10, section 11, after the word "lieutenant," insert the following:
"One hundred dentists, with rank, pay, and allowances of a first lieutenant, mounted, who shall be graduates of a dental college and shall pass a satisfactory professional examination."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 12, in line 13, after the word "professional," insert the words "competitive, and shall be not over 30 years of age."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to call the attention of the House to the fact that this is an entirely new feature incorporated in the Army bill. It provides for a corps of 100 dentists, with the rank of first lieutenant. It does not provide for any age limit whatever. It does not provide for any competitive examination, as has been heretofore provided for surgeons in the Army.

I think in the interest of the service that these dentists ought not to be over 30 years of age. Otherwise you may put in men of 60 years of age. You want men just from college, men who have a college education, men who have some knowledge of dentistry and who can stand a competitive as well as a professional examination, and not a lot of old men with a political pull. I trust that the amendment will be agreed to.

Mr. COX. I want to offer an amendment to the amendment of my friend from Virginia [Mr. HAY]. I desire to submit a proposition to strike out the entire section providing for this corps of dentists.

Mr. HAY. That would have to be an amendment to the bill, not an amendment to my amendment.

Mr. COX. There has never been a corps of this kind in the Army at all, and I want to put myself on record as having been opposed to it in the committee as I am opposed to it here. It does seem to me that we are going absolutely wild about this matter. I can not see any reason for putting 100 lieutenants in the Army as dentists.

Mr. HAY. With the consent of the Committee of the Whole, I will withdraw my amendment proposing to fix "thirty" as the age limit, and will move to insert "thirty-five."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the gentleman from Virginia modifies his amendment.

Mr. COX. Now my proposition would be in order, Mr. Chairman, would it not? I move to strike out the entire section providing for these dentists.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment of the committee is to insert such a paragraph. If that paragraph be voted down, the purpose of the gentleman from Tennessee will be accomplished.

The question being taken on agreeing to the amendment of Mr. HAY, it was rejected; there being—ayes 34, noes 73.

The amendment of the committee was then rejected.

Mr. HULL. I ask to offer an amendment on behalf of the committee, by striking out, in line 6, page 12, the word "ten" and inserting the word "eight," so as to provide for eight surgeons with the rank of colonel.

Mr. HAY. I move to amend the amendment by striking out "colonel" and inserting "lieutenant-colonel."

Mr. HULL. If that amendment should be adopted there would be no colonels in the Medical Department.

Mr. HAY. Well, why should there be any?

Mr. HULL. Because there have always been, and because it is proper to preserve this order of promotion.

Mr. HAY. Why should we go to this expense?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] that his amendment can not properly be entertained as an amendment to the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa, but it will be in order after that amendment is disposed of.

The question being taken on Mr. HULL'S amendment, it was agreed to.

Mr. HAY. I now move to amend by striking out "colonel" and inserting "lieutenant-colonel," so as to provide for "eight surgeons with the rank of lieutenant-colonel."

The amendment was not agreed to.

Mr. HULL. I move to amend by striking out, in line 7, the word "twenty" and inserting "sixteen," so as to provide for "sixteen surgeons with the rank of lieutenant-colonel."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. I move to amend by striking out, in line 8, the words "one hundred and ten" and inserting "sixty," so as to provide for sixty surgeons with the rank of major.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to the fact that the majority of the Committee on Military Affairs, by these amendments, are striking out the very officers who have more to do with the health and comfort of the soldiers than any other arm of the service.

By the pending amendment they are striking out in this bill, which provides for an army of 100,000 men, 50 surgeons; they are cutting down in other directions the surgical staff, which in peace as well as in war is essential to the health of the men of the Army. Why, sir, we heard complaints during the last war about surgeons in the Army; but no complaint was made about the efficiency of the surgeons of the Regular Army. They knew how to take care of their men.

I do not believe in relying on contract surgeons to take care of the health of the Army. I do not think this is the right place in this bill to undertake to cut down expenses. The amount proposed to be saved by this cutting down is, at any rate, a mere bagatelle in comparison with the important interests involved. A reduction of 331 staff officers, and about half of them taken from the Surgeon-General's Department, amounts to hardly anything in the grand total of the expense of this bill.

It does not amount to as much as $500,000 when you come to add up the salaries of these men. You have not taken a single officer from the line. You have reduced the companies down to 60, or say that you are going to do so, but we have not taken from them a single officer. But you make amendments for the purpose of strengthening the bill before this House which do not seem to have any bearing upon the questions embodied in the leading features of the bill. That is the complaint I make, and I think there has been some complaint before the country, as well as from the military service, as to the modifications and changes suggested.

Mr. HULL. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Virginia, only one or two words.

When the war broke out—I mean the late war with Spain—this force in the department consisted of 177 altogether. Now, we have increased it largely, as the bill shows, even with the pending amendment adopted.

Mr. HAY. To what extent?

Mr. HULL. Why, we have increased it to 235. We make the total number 235 under this provision; and I think it will be conceded that the law passed by Congress providing for the employment of contract surgeons has been a success. We have been enabled to secure competent men at $150 per month, and there is no trouble in getting them at that rate. Their services have been of great importance in the Army during the late war.

Now, we fix the staff on the theory that the Army will be greatly reduced, and we are endeavoring to make the bill conform so that there will be no necessity for changing it hereafter, or any necessity for legislation on the part of Congress to reduce the number of officers and muster them out of the service. We would prefer to make the bill to correspond exactly with the action of the House with reference to the total strength of the Army. The bill makes a sufficient increase, with the amendments which have been suggested. The increase proposed by these amendments to this section will meet all of the requirements of the service, in the judgment of the committee.

Mr. HENDERSON. The amendment is all right. Let us take a vote upon it.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, in line 9 of the same paragraph, I move to strike out the words "three hundred and sixty" and insert instead thereof the words "one hundred and fifty."

Mr. HENDERSON. That is right. Let us have a vote.

Mr. HULL. This refers to the assistant surgeons who are commissioned with the rank of first lieutenant.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, in line 14 of the same section of the bill, I move to strike out the word "two" and insert "one;" so as to read:

And a hospital corps consisting of 150 hospital sergeants.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. In line 16 of the same paragraph, I move to strike out "one hundred" and insert "sixty."

This is a provision for the pharmacists.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. In line 18 I move to strike out "four hundred" and insert "two hundred." This relates to the hospital corporals.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

Mr. HULL. In lines 19 and 20 I move to strike out "3,000" and insert "1,500."

This, Mr. Chairman, is in respect to the privates employed in the Hospital Corps.

Mr. COX. I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Military Affairs, who reports the bill now before the committee, why it is that these changes are being made? Since the bill came into the House it seems that the whole thing is going by amendments and modifications, and changes are made that we can not not well understand.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, in answer to the gentleman from Tennessee, it is sufficient to say that my understanding was, when we put the minimum at 50,000 men in the Army, we were to reduce the rest of the force to correspond.

Mr. HAY. Has the gentleman amended the bill in all other respects? It seems to me, in some respects no change has been made from the total force fixed originally by the committee.

Mr. COX. Well, I am against the whole thing, and would not object to seeing it defeated in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Iowa.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, there is the committee amendment on page 13, line 8 to line 10, to strike out the words:

That all vacancies in grade of assistant surgeons shall be filled by competitive examinations, as now provided by law.

And insert in lieu thereof the words:

That no person shall be appointed to fill any vacancy in the grade of assistant surgeon until he shall have passed a satisfactory professional examination.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 13, beginning with line 8, strike out the words "That all vacancies in grade of assistant surgeons shall be filled by competitive examinations, as now provided by law" and insert in lieu thereof the words "That no person shall be appointed to fill any vacancy in the grade of assistant surgeon until he shall have passed a satisfactory professional examination."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, just one word as to that amendment. The majority of the committee preferred the use of the word "professional" to that of "competitive," for the reason that they believed that the word "competitive" was more "civil service" than the other, and that the word "professional" left more latitude in the appointment from those who passed a satisfactory professional examination, while the word "competitive" meant that those who passed highest, regardless of any other question, must be appointed. That is the whole question, and the House is able to decide it.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I should like to ask——

Mr. HAY. I believe I have the floor.

Mr. HULL. I had not yielded the floor. I will yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. CANNON. If the amendment is adopted as you propose it, there will be some chance, in the examination of the assistant surgeons before they are appointed, to ascertain their common sense and their professional capacity, rather than to decide it all on the answers to questions in black and white.

Mr. HULL. That is all there is to it.

Mr. CANNON. Then I am for it.

Mr. HULL. That is all there is to it.

Mr. HAY. I want to state that the law for a long time has provided for competitive examinations for surgeons in the Army, and has produced very good results. The surgeons in the Army are a fine body of men and always have been.

Now, the gentleman undertakes to say something about the civil service. I am as much opposed to the civil service as he or any other man, but this is no question about civil service. This is a question as to a man's particular fitness for a professional duty, and I do not understand that this service has ever been called a part of the civil service in any possible way.

As the present system has produced good results heretofore, why change it and make it "professional," which means that if a man passes a professional examination put up by a board, however low he may pass, he may be put in the Army as a surgeon above a man who possesses qualifications much higher than he has? This does not meet the position of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] at all. Who is going to judge of it? The Surgeon-General? No. Of course it is going to be a political appointment, and that is what it is intended for and put in for.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

Mr. FLEMING. Do I understand the amendment to be to strike out the word "competitive" and insert the word "professional?"

Mr. HULL. That is the whole of the amendment.

Mr. FLEMING. In other words, to make it a matter of political appointment?

Mr. HULL. No, sir; it is not.

Mr. HANDY. Who offers the amendment?

Mr. HULL. The committee.

The question being taken, Mr. HAY demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 64, noes 30.

Mr. HAY. I make the point of no quorum.

Mr. HULL. I ask the gentleman to withdraw that, so that we can finish this section. Then the committee will rise until to-morrow.

Mr. HAY. Do you say that the committee will rise immediately after getting through with this section?

Mr. HULL. Yes; I will do that, if you will withdraw it.

Mr. HAY. Then that is understood?

Mr. HULL. Yes.

Mr. HAY. I withdraw the point of no quorum.

The CHAIRMAN. The ayes have it; and the amendment is agreed to.

Mr. HULL. I think there are no further amendments to this section. Now, Mr. Chairman, with the understanding that we commence on section 12 to-morrow morning—we had started to read section 12, and if it is the agreement of the committee, without reading section 12 now, that we commence with section 12 in the morning, I will move that the committee rise.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, section 12 will be considered as read.

Mr. HAY. I object to that.

Mr. HULL. That does not cut off the right of amendment or debate.

Mr. HAY. I should like to hear it read. It is a very interesting section.

Mr. HULL. I ask the Clerk to read it. It will take only a minute.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the Pay Department shall consist——

Mr. HAY. I rise to a point of order, or a point of etiquette and good faith. The gentleman from Iowa stated that if I would withdraw the point of no quorum, he would move that the committee rise. Now, the gentleman is going ahead with the next section.

Mr. HULL. My agreement was this, and I think the Reporter's notes will show it, that as soon as we completed section 11, I would then move that the committee rise.

Mr. HAY. Well, we have completed section 11 now, and you are proceeding to have section 12 read.

Mr. HULL. We have not completed section 11 until we begin the consideration of section 12. To-morrow morning it would have been possible to indefinitely amend section 11. That is the only reason why I wished to have section 12 read, or considered as read.

Mr. HAY. The Clerk has read the first line of section 12.

Mr. HULL. I understand that the Clerk has begun the reading of section 12. If we can begin on section 12 to-morrow morning, I will now move that the committee rise.

Mr. HAY. I would not have insisted upon any such point as the gentleman seems to fear.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is all right, and everybody is protected.

The motion of Mr. HULL that the committee rise was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11022, and had come to no resolution thereon.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. POWERS, by unanimous consent, obtained leave to withdraw from the files of the House, without leaving copies, the papers in the case of Oliver L. Kezer, Company A, Seventeenth Vermont Volunteers, no adverse report having been made thereon.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled a bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 10912. An act for adjusting clothing account for deceased soldiers in certain cases.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted to Mr. LAWRENCE, indefinitely, on account of sickness in his family.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent that when the House adjourn to-night it be to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that when the House adjourn, it adjourn to meet at 11 o'clock to-morrow morning. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 57 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until 11 o'clock a. m. to-morrow.

TEMPORARY FORCE OF THE NAVY.

Mr. CHANDLER. I report back favorably from the Committee on Naval Affairs, without amendment, the bill (S. 5363) granting extra pay to officers and enlisted men of the temporary force of the Navy, for which I ask present consideration. I ask that it may be read at length, subject to objection.

The Secretary read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the officers and enlisted men comprising the temporary force of the Navy during the war with Spain who served creditably beyond the limits of the United States, and who have been or may hereafter be discharged, shall be paid two months' extra pay; and all such officers and enlisted men of the Navy who have so served within the limits of the United States, and who have been or may hereafter be discharged, shall be paid one month's extra pay.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? The Chair hears none.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that a short letter on the subject from the Secretary of the Navy be read.

The Secretary read as follows:

NAVY DEPARTMENT, Washington, January 23, 1899.

SIR: I have the honor to transmit herewith a draft of a bill granting extra pay to officers and enlisted men of the temporary force of the Navy, and to recommend the same to the favorable consideration of the committee. A measure making like provision for the volunteer officers and men of the Army (H. R. 11243) unanimously passed the House on the 6th and the Senate on the 7th instant, and was approved January 12, 1899. (Public act No. 14.)

It has not been the custom of this Department to grant to officers and men leave of absence before discharge, but all are discharged upon their arrival home, or as soon thereafter as practicable. Nearly all those comprising the temporary force of the Navy have been discharged, and would not be entitled to the benefits of the proposed measure did its provisions not extend to those that have been heretofore, as well as those that may be hereafter, discharged.

These officers and men rendered efficient and valuable service to the Government, and merit the same favorable consideration as has been extended to those of the Army. Giving to the Volunteer Army, for similar service, privileges that are withheld from the Navy is a discrimination against the latter class, whose services deserve the highest consideration.

Very respectfully,

J. D. LONG, Secretary.

Hon. EUGENE HALE,
Chairman Committee on Naval Affairs,
United States Senate.

Mr. PETTIGREW. I did not hear the bill read that is under consideration. I should like to have it read.

The Secretary again read the bill.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will again ask, Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered as in Committee of the Whole.

The bill was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. BERRY. I ask the Chair to lay before the Senate Senate joint resolution 191, introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], in regard to the power of the Government over colonies.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution indicated by the Senator from Arkansas.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 191) declaring tha under the Constitution of the United States no power is given to the Federal Government to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently as colonies.

Mr. BERRY. Mr. President, If in November, 1896, it had been known or generally believed throughout the United States that within less than two years from the date of his inauguration the President of the United States would be asking Congress to grant a standing army of 100,000 men for the purpose of being used to subjugate and subdue a people 7,000 miles away from our territory, who were seeking to form a government of their own, he would not have received the electoral vote of a single State in this Union. Prior to that time the Government of the United States had been the friend of all people in all places who were struggling for liberty and who sought to establish a government for themselves. To the people of France, the people of the South American Republics, the people of Poland, the people of Hungary, the people of Greece, the Government of the United States and all the people of the United States have extended their sympathy when they were fighting for liberty. The last year of the nineteenth century will hereafter mark the date that will show when the Government of the United States first aligned itself with those nations which seek to impose government upon other people contrary to their will.

Mr. President, if less than one year ago, when the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] read from that desk to the Senate of the United States the Farewell Address of the Father of our Country, it had been asserted here that in less than twelve months from that time that Senator and a majority of his associates upon this floor would be advocating a policy which contradicts and disregards every word and every sentiment contained in that wonderful letter, that Senator would indignantly have denied it and resented it as an imputation upon his patriotism.

And yet we have gone forward, or backward, as you may choose to regard it, with such bewildering rapidity that to-day every man who dares to raise his voice in the way of protest against this radical departure from our time-honored beliefs, traditions, and professions is denounced as a traitor to his country, an ally, aider, and abettor of Malays, negroes, and savages.

Mr. President, it seems to me that the wholesale abuse, misrepresentation, and slander that daily come from the public press, and the intolerance shown by some Senators on this floor toward those who are unwilling to follow the President in his wild scheme of colonization and acquisition of territory is not the best and fairest way to determine and settle the great and important question which now confronts the American people.

When the protocol for peace was signed on the 12th day of last August, I think it could have been truthfully said that there had never been a time since the organization of the Government when the American Republic commanded so much respect from the nations of the world, and never a time when its own citizens felt for that Republic so much love, so much devotion, and so much admiration. Less than six months have passed and there are thousands and tens of thousands of intelligent and patriotic citizens who sincerely believe that the danger of the destruction and overthrow of our institutions has never been so great as it is to-day.

What has been the cause, Mr. President, of the remarkable change in the policy of our Government? What has been the mighty influence that has caused us to depart from the teachings of our fathers and to enter upon a course of action directly opposed to all that we have ever professed. Mr. President, men do not always agree as to causes and effects, but it seems to me that the all-powerful force that is pushing us on to destruction can be easily found. In 1896, for the first time since the organization of the Government, all of the great combinations of wealth, all of the great corporations, all of the trusts, all of the syndicates, boards of trade, merchants and manufacturers' associations and exchanges of the great cities, were united in the support of the same candidate for the Presidency. They were associated together as, and assumed for themselves, the name of the business men of the country. Many of them boldly claimed that the men who owned the wealth and property of the country had a right to dictate the policy of the Government and to name its Chief Magistrate. This powerful combination of wealth was able to control nearly all of the great daily newspapers, and they succeeded in electing William McKinley President of the United States.

Mr. President, it is largely the same element, the same mighty influence, which is to-day, under the plea that the United States must have a wider and broader field for trade and commerce, pushing us to a line of action that threatens the very foundations of the Republic. It is no doubt true that there are many earnest and honest people in all sections of the Union who believe that it is the duty of the Government to sacrifice the lives of thousands and tens of thousands of our own people in order to force civilization and Christianity at the cannon's mouth upon the people of those distant islands; but the influence of this class is small compared with those I have first named.

The cause for the universal rejoicing of our people at the close of the war can be easily understood. The unparalleled victories of our Navy at Manila and Santiago and the superb courage of our soldiers, coming as they did from all parts of the Union, at San Juan had astonished the world and excited the wildest enthusiasm of the American people. Europe had learned something of the tremendous power of a free people; and if any doubt remained there or elsewhere as to the loyalty and devotion of the people of every section of the Union to the American Government and American flag, that doubt was forever removed.

The pride and glory that the American people felt in the Army and Navy was greatly enhanced by the fact that all felt and knew that the war had been waged by us from unselfish and disinterested motives. We had fought to make others free as we ourselves were free; we had fought to enable the Cuban people to throw off their colonial dependence upon Spain and establish a free and independent government for themselves; we had disclaimed, in the act declaring war, any intention of acquiring territory in the island. The President himself had said that the forcible acquisition of territory would not be tolerated by the American people, and that such an attempt would be criminal aggression. The American people were proud because they had done a brave and generous and unselfish deed, which would be a gratification to them and to their children in all the years to come.

They had no thought then that the great combinations of wealth and greed would be able thereafter to unite and bring to bear such a mighty influence as would control the public press, to a large extent public sentiment, the President, and the Senate of the United States, and secure the adoption of a policy that would hereafter forever dim and obscure the glory that they had fairly won. We fought Spain in order to free the Cubans from her control. We can not, in my opinion, without placing a blot upon the fair name of the Republic, without dishonor to ourselves, fight the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands in order to subject them to our control. But such is the proposition made to us to-day. Under the terms of the protocol for peace signed by our Government and that of Spain, until the treaty of peace is ratified by the Senate the United States has no right in the Philippine Islands except to hold and defend the city of Manila, the harbor, and the bay.

It has been often said, Mr. President, that we hold those islands and that we can not turn them loose. That is not true. Except the city of Manila and the bay and harbor we do not hold those islands either in law or in fact, and, Mr. President, the city of Manila itself was never captured until after the protocol of peace was signed. This is admitted by those that supported the treaty; and it can not be denied that under the terms of the protocol of peace our rights were confined to the defenses of the city of Manila and its bay and its harbor.

Those who support the treaty urge this as a reason why there should be a speedy ratification of the treaty in order that General Otis may be at liberty to move forward his battalions to crush the Philippine government and slaughter those who resist. They insist that we must agree to a treaty by which we promise to pay Spain $20,000,000 in order to obtain her consent to make war upon those who were our allies in the recent contest; and we are told that any party or individual who refuses to give his consent to this proposition will meet with the indignation of the American people. Mr. President, it may be true; I do not know; but it seems to me that when the excitement of the hour has passed away and impartial history comes to be written the men who are urging the forcible acquisition of foreign territory will not be proud of the record they are making.

But I do know that any Senator upon this floor who earnestly and honestly believes that this policy endangers this country and who would be intimidated by any threat of indignation from any source or any power is unworthy of a seat upon the floor of the Senate. This matter is too great for any purpose, except that we stand by our convictions.

But it was said by the President of the United States, in his speech at Omaha, I think—at least in one of the speeches he made on his Western tour—that it is destiny, and we must meet it and accept it. Mr. President, the plea of destiny as an excuse for any course of action is an admission that no other reason can be given. If destiny is a sufficient excuse for wrong, then there is no crime however great and no infamy however degrading that a nation may not commit under that name. And we are told again that we must conquer these people in the interests of humanity and for their own good, that we must entail enormous expense upon our own people, that we must drag our youth to that far-off land, and kill and slaughter hundreds and, it may be, thousands of these people, in order that we may civilize and Christianize the remainder.

Mr. President, this is the same excuse, the same false pretense, that has been given by every nation of the world which sought to impose its government upon another people. This is the same excuse that was given by Spain when Cortes marched through Mexico and Pizarro through Peru, leaving burning houses and murdered men and women and children in their pathway. Spain said that it was in the interest of civilization and Christianity. When Lord Clive and Warren Hastings robbed India and committed outrages that shocked the civilized world, England said that this was done in the interest of humanity; that this was done in order to extend English commerce. So the same excuse was made by Austria and Prussia for the destruction of Hungary and Poland, and the same excuse was given by George the Third when he made war upon the colonies in this country.

But I am asked if I think our people are as bad as theirs. I answer no, Mr. President, I do not think they are; but the reason why I do not think they are is because they have never indulged in these practices in the past. But the very moment we attempt to govern foreign territory against the will of the inhabitants, the chances are, if history can be relied upon, that we shall grow worse year by year.

Mr. President, I do not believe that it is possible for any government, however pure that government may be, to give just government to people 7,000 miles away from the parent government.

Mr. President, those of us who live in the States of the South have some knowledge of the wrongs and outrages that may be perpetrated even by Americans where they seek to govern by strangers and by military power an unwilling people. Fortunately for our Republic, the people of the North learned in time that such government could not be continued without danger to every part of the Union, and I remember what universal applause from every part of the country greeted the statement made by the Hon. Charles Foster, of Ohio, when he said in the House of Representatives in 1877 that thereafter the flag of the country should wave over States and not provinces.

No, Mr. President, the plea of humanity is not the true cause of this movement. It doubtless has controlled the judgment of many, but the all-powerful force behind it is the desire of extending trade and commerce. It is the desire for gain, and not to relieve suffering. It has been urged by some who are in high position that it is necessary that we should do this thing in order that we might be in a position to share in the dismemberment of the Chinese Empire now going on by the governments of Europe, and that if other nations contested our right to do so the result would be an alliance, offensive and defensive, between Great Britain, the United States, and Japan. Mr. President, if this should come, the 100,000 soldiers now demanded will soon be 500,000. We will be plunged into foreign wars for fifty years to come; we will transmit to our children a great bonded debt and a military supremacy, and our great Republic will be a thing of the past. It is because of this possibility, and even probability, that I believe it to be the duty of every man who is opposed to such a policy to resist it at every step and in all honorable ways.

But, Mr. President, it is urged upon us that if we do not take the sovereignty of these islands and conquer and subdue these people other nations stand ready to seize them. It is a poor excuse for the commission of a crime that others stand ready to seize the opportunity, that others will be less honest. It is no defense to robbery to say that if we do not commit it some other party will.

But suppose it is true that other nations would seize the Philippine Islands, what obligations rest upon us to impose upon our own people burdens of so serious a character as this in order to become the protectors of a people on the shores of Asia? Spain's power has gone from the islands, and gone forever. She has not the power to-day to reconquer them. They have formed for themselves a government. Whether it is one suited to their conditions and their surroundings is for them to judge and not for us. Let us recognize their independence and give them a chance to organize and perfect that government, and not undertake to give them a government based upon force and contrary to their will.

But it is said that all this will be a matter for discussion and determination after the treaty is ratified; that after we have finally concluded the bargain by which we purchase the sovereignty of the islands and the right to control these people, after we have paid Spain $20,000,000 for these people, and after we have, by force, if need be, destroyed their present government, we may conclude at some time in the far distant future to give them a chance to form a new government, and we will then cease to control. Does any man believe that such is the purpose? Has the President of the United States ever avowed such a purpose? Does not the treaty itself show that it is not the purpose? The language of the treaty in the case of Cuba and that of the Philippines is purposely different. Cuba is not ceded to the United States, but Spain simply relinquishes her sovereignty. The Philippine Islands are ceded. Do you not to-day refuse absolutely to amend the treaty so as to make the promise to the people of those islands the same as that which we have given to Cuba? And have you not day by day refused to pass a joint resolution containing any kind of promise to those people? And yet we have men who are sufficiently credulous to believe, after the bond has been signed and sealed and the money paid, that in the far-off future you will do then what you even refuse to promise to do to-day.

In addition to this, Mr. President, it has been urged upon us that if we do not at once ratify the treaty, in all probability there will be a collision between our people and the people of the Philippine Islands; and it has been said that those on this floor who oppose this policy would be responsible. Mr. President, it seems to me that if we ratify the treaty and give the authority to General Otis to move forward with troops, a collision will be inevitable; and if that collision comes, I want it understood now that the responsibility will rest upon those who have changed a war begun for humanity into one that is being prosecuted and carried out for the sake of the acquisition of territory.

But, Mr. President, it is not the people of those far-off islands that concern me most; it is the effect upon our own country, our own Government, and our own institutions; it is the fear and dread that I have of a large standing army; it is the sympathy that I feel for the mothers whose boys, either voluntarily or by the operation of conscript laws, will perish in a useless foreign war; it is the regret I feel for the great demoralization of our people which must come when all their ideals are shattered and when we adopt a line of action which we have for more than a hundred years denounced as unjust and wicked.

Mr. President, I have not argued, and I do not intend to argue, the constitutional phases of this question, nor the power of Congress over the inhabitants of the Territories. The men who are most active in forcing this policy upon the Government are not likely to be restrained by constitutional inhibitions. That it certainly overrides, sets aside, and forever destroys the provisions of the Declaration of Independence, which declares that "all just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed," no man can seriously doubt. Every youth in our land has been taught to believe that this Declaration was the foundation stone of our Government. A distinguished Senator of this body, who I understand will vote for the treaty, said recently in a public speech in another place that some of those who were most earnestly now in favor of standing by the declaration that just government came from the consent of the governed disregarded that declaration when they made war upon the Southern States in 1861.

It is probable, Mr. President, that those to whom he referred will not admit that the conditions are the same, but I for one will not take issue with him. I believed in 1861, as he believed, that the Southern States had a right to govern themselves. I did, as he did, fight for four years for that belief. We were beaten, but neither he nor I changed our belief; and I will say to him that if the doctrine that "all just powers of government are derived from the consent of the governed" was true in 1861, it is true in 1899, and that I for one will never vote to force upon an unwilling people principles and policies against which Lee fought and to prevent which Jackson died. Nor will I ever vote to force upon the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, Malays, negroes, and savages though they be, the curse of a carpetbag government.

Already, Mr. President, we are beginning to see some of the evils that come from war and military power. We have a commission sitting to investigate charges of corruption and maladministration upon the part of high Army officers. Already, if the papers are to be believed, a commission under the authority of the War Department has been organized in this city to deal out franchises and privileges to a favored few in Cuba and Porto Rico. What charges of wrong and injustice will reach us from the far-off Philippines when the discredited politician at home shall be shipped there to govern time alone can tell. It is because I would stop all this and give at the earliest moment possible the power to govern themselves to the inhabitants of both Cuba and the Philippines that I am so earnestly opposed to this policy of expansion and imperialism. I want to keep our Government as it is, as our fathers gave it to us. I want to maintain the doctrine promulgated by President Monroe and always indorsed by the American people. I want to say that no foreign government shall secure a foot of land upon this continent, and that we will not seek to do that in the Eastern Hemisphere which we prohibit others from doing in the Western.

When war was declared against Spain we plighted the faith of the American nation that that war should be waged for the freedom of the people of Cuba and not for the acquisition of territory. It is true that the letter of the law confines that declaration to the island of Cuba itself, but no great nation, when its honor is at stake, can ever take advantage of a technicality. That promise was understood by the whole people of the United States and by every foreign nation in its broadest and widest sense, and that was that we had gone to war for the liberty of those people and not for the purpose of conquest or the acquisition of territory.

Mr. President, what is it we propose to-day? What shame and humiliation will we and our children and our children's children who are to come after us feel when we and they are taunted with the fact that we have agreed and bargained with Spain to take away the liberties of a people in part payment of the money we expended in a war begun for the sake of humanity? Mr. President, I want no such blot on the United States. I want to transmit this Government to our children with its honor untarnished and unimpaired.

It may be said, and has been said, that I did not feel that way some years ago. Mr. President, it is true that I was a soldier in the Southern army, and there never has been a day or an hour from that time to this when I was not proud of that service; yet, while that is true, I believe that the Government of the United States to-day is the best Government beneath God's sunshine. It is the only Government where the largest possibilities are open to all of its citizens; it is the only Government where the poorest and most obscure boy in the land, if he has the nerve to do and dare, if he has the will, if he is honest and speaks the truth, may aspire to any place within the gift of the people. That is why I love this Government, and that is why I would preserve its honor unimpaired.

I do not believe, after the solemn declaration we have made, that we can take and hold conquered territory to indemnify us for expenses of the war which we have waged without placing a blot and a stain upon the honor of this nation. I trust that that will never be done. If we hereafter, as we have tried to do in the past, hold truth and honor and fair fame far above all considerations of wealth, so long this Government will live and prosper; but when the time comes when the great body of our people believe that all things and all men are matters of merchandise and can be bought and sold like cattle, I say that this Republic will perish.

I say to-day that we are entering upon a dangerous field. We are doing it on the pretense, it may be, of humanity and Christianity, but behind it all, I repeat, is the desire for trade and commerce; and whenever and wherever considerations of money making are placed above the honor and fair fame of this Republic, the men who do it are undermining the very foundations of the Government under which we live.

ADMISSION TO WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HAWLEY. Yesterday the Senate passed the joint resolution (H. Res. 344) granting authority to the Republic of Venezuela to send a cadet to West Point Military Academy. There is a mistake in the name, and the mistake came to us from the State Department. I believe the joint resolution has not been sent to the House of Representatives, and I now enter a motion to reconsider the vote by which the joint resolution was passed.

Mr. COCKRELL. When was the joint resolution passed?

Mr. HAWLEY. It was passed by the Senate yesterday.

Mr. COCKRELL. All right.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The motion of the Senator from Connecticut will be entered.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, yesterday, on my motion, the Senate took up Senate joint resolution 211 for consideration and action, and, as explained by me yesterday, this is a resolution which, unless it is acted upon within a reasonable time, will by lapse of time fail of the purpose, even though the Senate should thereafter desire to act upon it.

I do not wish to be unduly importunate; at the same time I think the consideration I have mentioned is one which should constrain the action of the Senate; and in order that the Senate may have the opportunity to act upon the joint resolution within such time as will make it effective if the Senate shall agree to it, I now move that the Senate take up Senate joint resolution No. 211.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of a joint resolution, the title of which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 211) relative to the acquisition of foreign territory.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on the motion of the Senator from Georgia.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I do not desire to detain the Senate with any remarks upon the joint resolution at this time. If there is no desire upon the part of any Senator to address the Senate upon the joint resolution, I will ask the Senate to vote upon it now.

Mr. SPOONER. What is the pending motion, Mr. President? It is to refer the joint resolution, is it not?

Mr. BACON. I think, if I am not mistaken in the status of the resolution, when the hour of 2 o'clock arrived yesterday it went to the Calendar. I may be mistaken in that, however.

Mr. SPOONER. There is a motion pending to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, as I recollect it. I do not think that motion died with the session.

Mr. BACON. Very well.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The senior Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] entered a motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations; and that is the pending motion.

Mr. BACON. That is the pending motion; and upon that motion I have called for the yeas and nays.

Mr. CARTER. This is a matter of some moment, and I observe the Senate is not very largely attended by its members. I therefore suggest the absence of a quorum.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The absence of a quorum being suggested, the Secretary will call the roll.

The Secretary called the roll, and the following Senators answered to their names:

Aldrich,	Faulkner,	McMillan,	Roach,
Bacon,	Foraker,	Mallory,	Ross,
Bate,	Frye,	Mantle,	Sewell,
Berry,	Gear,	Mason,	Shoup,

Davis,	McBride,	Pritchard,
Deboe,	McEnery,	Quay,

Mr. TILLMAN. I wish to announce that my colleague [Mr. MCLAURIN] is detained from the Senate on account of illness in his family.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. In answer to the roll call, 61 Senators have responded. There is a quorum present. The Senator from Georgia demands the yeas and nays on his motion to proceed to the consideration of the joint resolution.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, this resolution is one of a series of resolutions which have been from time to time introduced in the Senate for the purpose of declaring what our policy with regard to the Philippine Islands is not to be. I think no one has yet, unless it be the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], signified what he thought the policy of the Government ought to be with reference to the Philippine Islands should we acquire them.

I wish to say that I can not vote for any of these resolutions, and I wish to give my reasons for that, so that my vote may not be misunderstood.

The first resolution which was introduced was one by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], to the effect that it is unconstitutional to acquire any territory under any circumstances except for Government buildings and the like, and to hold it and govern it permanently as a colony.

The next resolution, as I remember it, was one introduced by the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], in the preamble of which was the statement that "all governments derived their just powers from the consent of the governed," and he proposes to have a Senate resolution passed making the declaration that we will not take any territory anywhere or attempt to govern any territory anywhere except by the consent of those who reside on it.

The third resolution, as I remember, was one introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR], in which he recited certain statements from the Declaration of Independence, and closed by saying that the United States in the case of the Philippine Islands did not intend in any way to interfere with those human rights guaranteed by the Declaration of Independence.

Then comes the resolution of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON], which is a joint resolution. It is not very long, and I ask the Secretary to read it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolution of Congress making the declaration of said war, the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

Second. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain permanent dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government.

Third. That whereas at the time of the declaration of war by the United States against Spain, and prior thereto, the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands were actively engaged in a war with Spain to achieve their independence, and whereas said purpose and the military operations thereunder have not been abandoned, but are still being actively prosecuted thereunder, therefore, in recognition of and in obedience to the vital principle announced in the great declaration that governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed," the Government of the United States recognizes that the people of the Philippine Islands of a right ought to be free and independent; that, with this view and to give effect to the same, the Government of the United States has required the Government of Spain to relinquish its authority and government in the Philippine Islands and to withdraw its land and naval forces from the Philippine Islands and from the waters thereof.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, and assert their determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been erected therein entitled to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and to thereupon leave the government and control of the islands to their people.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, analyzing that resolution, it means one thing, and one thing only, that if we acquire the Philippine Islands by the ratification of the pending treaty, it is the duty of the United States to immediately surrender them to the inhabitants of those islands.

Mr. BACON. It does not say so, at least. It says quite the contrary.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It does not say so; but if it be true "that in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain permanent dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government," there can be no other construction placed upon the resolution by the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands, at least, than that this Government takes those islands to turn them over immediately to the inhabitants thereof.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Connecticut, in that connection, kindly read the fourth resolution and see whether it means immediately or not?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will read the fourth resolution. That is more emphatic:

That the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands.

Mr. BACON. The word "permanent," the Senator will remember, was put in by amendment yesterday. It now reads "permanent sovereignty." Now, read the balance of the clause, please.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It says:

And assert their determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been erected therein entitled to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and to thereupon leave the government and control of the islands to their people.

Does not that carry out what I said is the proper construction and what will be understood by the people of the Philippine Islands to be the proper construction of these resolutions, especially when the third resolution counts on the fact "announced in the great Declaration that governments derive 'their just powers from the consent of the governed,'" and says "the Government of the United States recognizes that the people of the Philippine Islands of a right ought to be free and independent?"

Mr. GRAY. Does it say "are?"

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. It says "of a right ought to be free and independent."

Mr. President, I wish to know what construction can be placed upon that resolution, if the Congress of the United States passes it, by the other powers of the world or by the Filipinos themselves, except that we take possession of the islands simply for the purpose of turning them over to the inhabitants thereof. What declaration is there in the resolution that the United States will have any right even to maintain themselves in the Philippine Islands until such time as a stable government can be established? It is clean, clear-cut, all-embracing of the doctrine that we have no right there and will have no right there after the islands have become ours by virtue of the treaty.

Mr. President, there are some reasons, as I said, why I can not vote for any resolution at this time. These resolutions have not taken the ordinary course of bills and resolutions upon important topics introduced in the Senate of the United States. The proposers of these resolutions have not desired to have them receive the consideration of any committee of this body, but insist that they shall be voted upon without consideration and report by a committee. Aimed at the same object, they differ somewhat widely in their details, and each Senator who proposes a resolution of this kind, by which he would have the Government of the United States and its Congress for all time committed to a policy with reference to the territory we may acquire as the result of this war, wants his resolution adopted, or else, as we are informed, his vote can not be had for the ratification of the treaty. It is because the situation is too grave, because the consequences of any declaration which we may make here will be too lasting, that I am unwilling to vote in favor of any of these resolutions.

Let us look at the situation for a moment. It would scarcely seem credible outside of this country, among the people of other nations, that upon the consideration of a peace treaty the attempt should be made by Senators who do not like the treaty to amend it in this way or to defeat it if their plans and ideas do not receive consideration. What is the situation, Mr. President? We have had a war. It has ended, so far as it has ended, gloriously for our arms, our policies, our institutions, and the cause of free government in the world. On the 12th of August last the contending powers, the United States and Spain, came to an agreement, and a protocol was signed, and the matter of the negotiation of a treaty which should put an end to the war legally was left to commissioners to meet in Paris. That was the 12th of August last. It is now the last day of January. Nearly six months have passed. Those commissioners have met and the two nations which were at war have agreed upon the terms of peace. Spain has surrendered the most valuable territory which we had conquered. She has evacuated Cuba and Porto Rico. Whatever may be the fate of this treaty we come in possession of those islands. Spain has surrendered them believing that an agreement would be arrived at in regard to the Philippines and the other territory.

I wish to say here that I believe the negotiation of this treaty reflects the greatest honor upon the diplomacy of the United States of any treaty that has ever been negotiated. I hear a great deal said about our being at a disadvantage when we meet the trained diplomatists of Europe, because we in this country have had no special training for diplomacy, but the commissioners who were sent by the President met the trained diplomatists of Europe, and this treaty is a triumph for American diplomacy. One of the great opposers of the treaty has written a book called Triumphant Democracy, and I suggest to him that we should call this treaty Triumphant Diplomacy. It is a diplomacy which honors the United States, which honors its armies, which honors its Navy, which honors its traditions, which honors its Declaration of Independence, which honors free government and the cause of humanity in the world.

But, Mr. President, while this treaty has been in process of negotiation an ambitious leader in the Philippine Islands has been raising revolt, and I say revolt against the United States and its Government and its Navy and its Army. He is to-day a Spanish citizen arraying Spanish subjects against the United States. He had a great opportunity to do so, because by the terms of the protocol, by the operation of international law, he had a free field for his operations. We had taken all effective Spanish soldiers in the island prisoners, so that Spain could not resist him. We had tied our hands by the protocol until a treaty of peace should be declared, so that the United States could not resist him.

By reason of the situation he was given free course in all his operations. He has gathered an insurgent band and to-day gives notice to the United States that unless he is recognized as the ruler of that territory he will contest his right by armed attack upon the armies of the United States. The situation is critical. He is in arms, using the arms which the United States furnished him, and in arms against the United States authority. That is the situation. Against whom else is Aguinaldo in arms? Against whom else are the threats of warfare? The ratification of a peace treaty will give the United States rights which it does not possess now. It will give the United States the right then to say, "We are in control of these islands, attack us if you dare," and in a very short time, without warfare, this insurgent band will melt away, better counsels will prevail, and a government superior, immensely superior, to anything which Aguinaldo could establish there will bless the inhabitants of those islands.

To defeat this treaty relegates us to a state of war, legally. What will happen then no human being knows or can foresee. Whether actual warfare will go on, or whether Spain will submit to what she will consider a game of the United States played upon her and say to us, "We have no more treaties to make; we made one and you refused it; do your worst;" and thus keep us interminably in a state of legal war, or whether she may negotiate some new treaty, no human being knows. It is probable, Mr. President, that she would insist, as I think she might have a right to insist, in morals if not in law, that if we do not take the Philippines, which she has agreed to cede to us, we shall at least restore her to the position which she occupied in the Philippines at the time the peace commissioners met. That would be nothing but fairness, Mr. President. I do not say whether it would be law or not.

Will some Senator who wishes these resolutions passed tell me what he proposes, when the treaty is rejected, to have the Government of the United States do; what he proposes to have the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States do?

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me for a moment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I simply desire to interrupt him to say that the object of these resolutions is not to defeat the treaty, but to secure its ratification.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I will come to that point in a moment. Suppose the treaty be defeated. What will Senators who insist upon the passage of these resolutions, and say they will vote against the treaty if they are not passed, have the President of the United States do? Will they have him recall Dewey and Otis from the Philippine Islands? The President who would do that, the body of men who would recommend him to do that, would incur the just condemnation and indignation of the people of the United States.

What are we to do in this war to which we will be restored? Are we to attack Spain in other quarters of the globe and her other possessions, or are we to sit down and do nothing and allow an interminable condition where we are legally at war, but not actively at war? No one answers that question. No one can answer that question except it be said in answer that it would be the duty of the United States immediately to follow up its operations in the Philippine Islands, to bring those islands into the condition of a conquered archipelago, and to establish there by military occupation such a government as will preserve life, secure property, and all the blessings of freedom which it is possible they should enjoy.

So, if the treaty is to be defeated we are put in exactly the position which the Senators who have proposed these resolutions say they do not want to be put in. They say they are not willing to have the treaty ratified until they know what the Congress is going to do with the islands, and yet if these resolutions are not passed they propose to defeat the treaty and put this Government in a position where it can not in honor, or without making itself the disgrace of the civilized world, do anything except to continue its military occupation and to establish a government by military power.

It is said these resolutions are not introduced for the purpose of defeating the treaty, but for the purpose of enabling it to be ratified. This treaty, then, is to be voted against unless the Senate, whether it believes in these resolutions or no, will adopt them. I do not see how that differs from the introduction of these resolutions for the purpose of defeating the treaty, unless a minority of the Senate can compel the majority to vote for them.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me for a moment?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I will not interrupt the Senator if he objects.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not object at all.

Mr. BACON. I am somewhat less reluctant to trespass upon his time, for I feel that I am rather assisting him in what I hope I do not do him an injustice in suggesting may be the consumption of time between now and 2 o'clock. I would not cooperate in that effort if I were not satisfied that without my cooperation it would be accomplished. I simply interrupt the Senator to say that it is not the purpose of those who favor these resolutions, as suggested by the Senator from Connecticut, to force a majority of the Senate to agree to resolutions in which they do not believe, but that the purpose of the resolutions is to get an expression of the Senate, which I can but believe, if allowed to be had, will be in favor of the adoption of the resolutions.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I understand the Senator from Georgia to say that if his joint resolution is adopted he will vote for the treaty?

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Connecticut is correct in that respect.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. And that if it is not adopted the inference is—I do not know whether he has stated it—that he will vote against the treaty?

Mr. BACON. I certainly do so state now.

Mr. SPOONER. Will the Senator allow me? What right has this Congress, which will die on the 4th of March, to proclaim a policy for the United States?

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Connecticut does not object——

Mr. SPOONER. I withdraw the question.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Connecticut does not object to the interjection of that discussion—and it will take some time to answer the question——

Mr. SPOONER. I think so.

Mr. BACON. I desire to correct myself in one particular, though. I said, in response to the suggestion of the Senator from Connecticut, that I would not vote for the treaty unless these resolutions were adopted. I would modify that to the extent of saying that unless there is a declaration by the lawmaking power which shall express the vital principle embodied in these resolutions, that this Government will not exercise permanent dominion and sovereignty in those islands.

I do not mean by that, as would be indicated by his remarks, to put the Senate upon terms. I simply mean to put myself in a position where, if such is the view of the lawmaking power, I will very gladly vote for the treaty. I do not mean to say that I am threatening them with my vote if they do not agree to it. I simply mean to say that if that is the view of the Government and that is the intention of the Government, then I am prepared to vote for the treaty. If it is not the view and the intention of the Government, then I am not prepared to do so. That is all there is to it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from Georgia goes further than that in that he says in effect "if that is the policy of the Government, they must declare it now or I will not vote for the treaty."

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I hold that such resolutions are entirely out of place.

Mr. TELLER. Will the Senator from Connecticut allow me to ask the Senator from Georgia a question?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Certainly.

Mr. TELLER. I wish to ask if he means by that statement that this resolution must pass the House and receive the approval of the President before the vote is taken on the treaty?

Mr. BACON. Certainly. It is a joint resolution and it would be brutum fulmen unless that was the course it took.

Mr. TELLER. Does the Senator mean to say that he would not vote for the treaty, although the resolution may pass the Senate, unless it also passes the House and gets the approval of the President?

Mr. BACON. I do, because unless it is so passed by the other House and gets the approval of the President it amounts to nothing. If the Senator from Connecticut will pardon me, it would not amount to the force of a resolution by the Senate, because it would not be binding on the Senate until it had received the approval of the other House and the President.

Mr. TELLER. That statement of the Senator from Georgia will determine my vote on this resolution. I think myself it is utterly impossible to pass the resolution through the House, and so does the Senator, in time for next Monday. If the Senator will attempt to get the opinion of the power that ratifies the treaty, I will join him in passing just such a resolution, if that would be satisfactory. I do not believe in passing a resolution with full knowledge that it can not pass the other House before we vote upon the treaty. I should like myself a declaration from the ratifying power as to what the sentiment of this body is.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Connecticut will pardon me for a moment, it is not impossible for these resolutions to receive the sanction of the House in formal agreement thereto if it is the desire of the House to pass the same. There is plenty of time to do it. It can be done in any one day after they get to the House, and if the House does not desire to pass them, they would not pass them in a year.

Mr. TELLER. If I may be allowed, the Senator from Georgia knows very well that whatever may be the sentiment of the House it is within the power of a few men to prevent its passage, and therefore there is no probability that it would pass before next Monday. If the Senator wants to get some authoritative declaration, it seems to me he had better address himself to getting it from the treaty-ratifying power.

Mr. BACON. The Senator will mark the fact that the treaty-making power is not confined to the Senate. It embraces the President also.

Mr. TELLER. The President has already acted.

Mr. BACON. Yes; but the President has not acted upon this expression and can not unless it reaches him in the shape of a joint resolution passed by the two Houses.

Mr. CHILTON. Or by an amendment.

Mr. BACON. Or by an amendment to the treaty.

Mr. TELLER. There is no reason to suppose, so far as I know, from any declaration the President has made, that he is not in accord with this sentiment. Last summer he said:

> I speak not of forcible annexation, for that can not be thought of. That, by our code of morality, would be criminal aggression.

Mr. BACON. I will go further, if the Senator will pardon me. I will vote for the treaty if the Senate will make such a declaration as is contained in these resolutions, and if we can get an expression from the President to that effect, without the House.

Mr. TELLER. I do not know how we can get it.

Mr. BACON. I do not, either; but we can get it. It is practical.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not question the motives of Senators. I agree that every Senator is as pure and disinterested in his motives as I am or any other Senator. I am not one who imputes improper motives to Senators; but I wish to call the attention of the Senate to this remarkable declaration. Here are resolutions introduced by a Senator, and he says, "I will vote for the treaty if the resolutions can be passed by the Senate, and the expression of the President of the United States can be obtained as to whether he agrees to the policy announced in the resolutions."

It is a most remarkable declaration, Mr. President. Outside of this Chamber it will be regarded as a hold-up of this treaty until the individual ideas of Senators as to what policy shall be pursued in the future in regard to these particular acquisitions can be stated and voted by the Senate and the advice and opinion of the President obtained thereon.

The Senator doubtless thinks that that matter lies on his conscience and that he can not vote for the treaty until such a declaration has been made and until the President of the United States has been forced to declare himself as to the future policy of this Government with regard to the treatment of this particular acquired territory. I can hardly believe the Senator can understand in what a position he places himself in the eyes of the country.

Now, Mr. President, I can not vote for this resolution at this time for the best of reasons. There is not a Senator in the United States Senate who knows what the Government ought to do with reference to those islands. There is not a Senator in the United States Senate who is prepared to-day to formulate a policy for the action of the Government in those islands. If any Senator sat down to attempt it, to put on paper precisely what the Government ought to do, unless he said the Government ought to leave there and have nothing to do with them, he would find it utterly impossible to satisfy himself in framing a bill which should define the policy of this Government.

Mr. BACON. Will I interrupt the Senator from Connecticut?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Not at all.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to call the attention of the Senate to the fact that there is no effort in the joint resolution to formulate any particular policy. It leaves everything open to future determination, except as to one thing. It simply declares that this Government will not maintain a permanent dominion and sovereignty in those islands.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What does that mean, Mr. President?

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator pardon me just a moment? If I interrupt him unduly, I will not do so. Mr. President, I think that we can very readily relinquish what is required by the joint resolution, to wit, such sovereignty as we have in the Philippine Islands.

If the Senator will pardon me, I desire to read a short extract which indicates to what extent we have anything to relinquish in that country.

In yesterday morning's Washington Post there appeared a letter from some gentleman whose name is not given, but whose character is indicated by the Washington Post, which, as everybody knows, is an extreme expansion paper. That paper says of this correspondent as follows:

> Pertinent to the attention and interest given to the Philippine situation by the United States Senate, in its discussions of the several resolutions pertaining to the question of expansion and imperialism, the following extracts from letters written by a gentleman well known in Washington and New York, socially and commercially, will no doubt prove both interesting and instructive. As the letter was written with no idea of its ever being published, the name of the writer is withheld. If this name could be given, however, it would be sufficient guaranty of the accuracy and unprejudiced character of the writer's comments on the situation in the Orient.

Now, just one or two short extracts from that letter. The writer says:

> This must be remembered by those who would scoff at such a recognition of the Filipinos, that at present they hold the country; that even the governor-general himself can not go 3 miles up the river Pasig without the permission of the president of the Filipino republic, and that any other but a peaceful solution by intelligent, reasonable diplomacy will mean a long war of the guerrilla kind, in which our soldiers will perish by thousands from disease as well as bullets, and success will not merely be uncertain, but, even attained, will be out of proportion to the sacrifice. I am confident that this is the situation; but I am also reasonably certain that those in authority here, in Washington, at Paris, are not cognizant of the facts, of their real significance.

Now, one other short extract, if the Senator will pardon me, from the same letter:

> A Filipino congress is now in session at Malolos, representing a large portion of Luzon (perhaps two-thirds). I have not been able to see the body in session, but my companion has been present, and has been deeply impressed with their acquaintance with parliamentary procedure, their ability to speak intelligently and clearly (he had an interpreter at his side), their earnestness, and their signs of power over those whom they represented.

I repeat that, while the name of the writer is not given, it is one that is vouched for by the editors of the Washington Post.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, we have an anonymous letter writer brought in here as authority to the fact, I suppose, that the Filipinos are in a situation to establish and maintain, against foes within and foes without, a free government. If that be so, then, according to the Senator's idea, we ought to retire from there at once.

But I go back to what I was saying, that there is no Senator on this floor who can say to-day whether that is true or not. There is no Senator on this floor who can say whether that people are capable of self-government in all those numerous islands and among all those numerous tribes; whether it is possible, even with the aid of the United States, in one year, or two years, or five years, to establish a free government and a government which shall secure life and property and freedom in those islands or not.

No one knows, Mr. President, but by the time this treaty is ratified, or immediately after its ratification, the troops of the United States, the Army of the United States, may be engaged in war brought on by this insurgent attack upon it.

What kind of a declaration would this be in view of such a condition? We can not foresee conditions; we are without information. No man can tell whether it is for the interest of the United States or for the interest of the people of the Philippine Islands to do that at present, and yet it is insisted that the treaty shall not be ratified until that is all mapped out, not specifically, but in general terms.

Such resolutions have no place at this time, Mr. President. They are absolutely futile if passed. They do not bind any other Congress. An occasion might arise, circumstances might arise, where it would be the duty of the United States Congress to sweep them aside and act otherwise than is proposed in this joint resolution.

But, Mr. President, any resolution of this character which we may pass here will be, as I said in the commencement of the few remarks which I am making, open to misconstruction, and will be misconstrued everywhere.

Suppose after the passage of this joint resolution has secured a ratification of the treaty it should be thought that it was proper, more for our interest, more for the real interests of the Filipinos, not permanently, as the joint resolution says, but for the time being only, that the United States should attempt to maintain peace and order in those islands.

Mr. Aguinaldo would come with the joint resolution in his hand and say, "You passed a solemn resolution in order to ratify the treaty, saying we were entitled to independence, and that it was not the purpose of the Government 'to secure and maintain permanent dominion over the same,' 'or to incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States.' You disclaimed any disposition or intent to exercise permanent sovereignty." He would also point to this clause, "announced in the great Declaration that governments derive 'their just powers from the consent of the governed;'" that "the Government of the United States recognizes that the people of the Philippine Islands of right ought to be free and independent." And would he not have a right to say so? Would not every nation in Europe say that Aguinaldo, with that joint resolution passed in the Senate, had a right to insist on the immediate independence of the Philippine Islands, because governments could only derive their just powers from the consent of the governed, and he did not consent to the United States in those islands at all, and his government did not, because the joint resolution declared that the Filipinos of right ought to be free and independent?

With the passage of the joint resolution and the ratification of the treaty secured, as they tell us it may be by the passage of the joint resolution, how is the United States going to maintain the slightest authority thereafter in the Philippine Islands for any purpose, either in the city of Manila or elsewhere, except by consent of Aguinaldo and his insurgent band and his shadowy congress? Is the Senate of the United States going to place itself in that position? Does any Senator doubt that that will be the construction placed by Aguinaldo upon the joint resolution, if it passes, in which he will receive the sympathy of the world so far as the construction of the joint resolution is concerned?

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Connecticut yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. I presume the Senator from Connecticut will not object to my calling his attention, or rather recalling his attention, to a statement in the papers of this city as to the speech that was made by General Shafter at a banquet two or three weeks ago in which he announced a willingness to disarm those people and, if necessary, to kill half of them to do it. I wish to know whether he sympathizes with that view.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Oh, well, Mr. President, I do not think it is required of me that I shall answer that question. It is entirely irrelevant. We are not discussing General Shafter.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator——

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. We are not discussing the newspapers; we are not discussing the peculiar ideas which the Senator from South Carolina seems by his interruptions to entertain.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Connecticut suspend one moment while the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

Mr. DAVIS and Mr. BACON rose.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the Senator from Minnesota kindly yield to me just a moment?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

Mr. BACON. I hope I may be allowed to ask that the Senator from Connecticut may have unanimous consent to complete his remarks. Does the Senator from Minnesota yield for that request on my part?

Mr. DAVIS. I have yielded to the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HAWLEY (to Mr. PLATT of Connecticut). Do you want consent to complete your remarks?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. No; I do not, Mr. President. If I had not been interrupted I should have concluded all I want to say. There was only one other point which I wished to speak of, and I am willing to leave the matter where it is left.

ADMISSION TO WEST POINT MILITARY ACADEMY.

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask unanimous consent that the votes by which the joint resolution (H. Res. 344) granting authority to the Republic of Venezuela to send a cadet to West Point Military Academy was read the third time and passed be reconsidered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Connecticut asks unanimous consent that the votes by which the joint resolution indicated by him was read the third time and finally passed may be reconsidered. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The votes are reconsidered.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move to make the corrections I have indicated to the clerks at the desk. In line 4 of the joint resolution, I move to strike out the hyphen and the word "Ruego," and in lines 7 and 8, I move to strike out the hyphen and the word "Ruego."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the Senator from Connecticut.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I do not wish to interpose, as I did not the other day when this joint resolution was before the Senate, but the more I think of it the more I regret its introduction, and I want in one or two minutes to put on record my view of the matter.

I am told that the person who is expected to be sent to the Military Academy under the joint resolution is a young gentleman of excellent qualities; that he belongs to an excellent family, who have been especially friendly in sentiment to the people of the United States; and I am quite sure that every member of the Senate and every American would like to pay a mark of respect to the sister Republic of Venezuela; but after all, if we set the example——

Mr. HAWLEY. We set it forty years ago.

Mr. HOAR. Well, if we continue to set the example, then, which has been set forty years ago, of educating at the request of foreign governments their military or naval officers at our expense, we are educating persons whose duty it may be to employ the result of their education in war against the United States, and it is inconsistent with a military establishment to do that.

If any government in Europe, however powerful, if Germany, France, or Great Britain, or if China or Japan in the Orient, should esteem it a good policy to send some of their young men to get at our military methods, perhaps our secrets, our mode of education for the training of their officers, and if we extend this courtesy to one country we can not refuse it to others, I hope this application will not be repeated. As I said, as the Senate has passed on it and the House has passed on it without any objection, I do not wish to interpose an objection now, but it seems to me it is a very grave and serious departure. Could we refuse the same request to Brazil to-morrow, or to Japan?

Mr. GRAY. May I ask the Senator from Massachusetts a question for information?

Mr. HOAR. Certainly.

Mr. GRAY. I think what the Senator says is very important, but I ask him if there is not an international custom among countries to allow each other this privilege? For instance, I believe that cadets who graduate in a certain grade, the two highest, at Annapolis have the choice of being sent by this Government to Greenwich, in England, to pursue a post-graduate course there in naval architecture.

Mr. HOAR. But Greenwich is not essentially a naval school.

Mr. GRAY. I do not know. I was asking for information.

Mr. HOAR. It is a school like the École Politechnique in Paris, or like a great many of the schools of instruction in the science of government.

Mr. GRAY. It is a Government institution?

Mr. HOAR. It is a Government institution, I understand.

Mr. GRAY. And cadets from West Point may be sent to Woolwich, which is an army school, also in the same way? I did not know whether there was an international custom founded upon courtesy or comity, or not.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment was ordered to be engrossed and the joint resolution to be read a third time.

The joint resolution was read the third time, and passed.

SUITS AGAINST GOVERNMENT OFFICERS.

Mr. HOAR submitted the following report:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 6901) to prevent the abatement of certain actions, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

The House recede from its nonconcurrence with the Senate amendments, and concur therein with an amendment as follows: Strike out all the text of said amendment and substitute as follows:

"That no suit, action, or other proceeding, lawfully commenced by or against the head of any Department or bureau or other officer of the United States, in his official capacity or in relation to the discharge of his official duties, shall abate by reason of his death, or the expiration of his term of office, or his retirement or resignation or removal from office; but, in such event, the court, on motion or supplemental petition filed, at any time within twelve months thereafter, showing a necessity for the survival thereof to obtain a settlement of the questions involved, may allow the same to be maintained by or against his successor in office, and the court may make such order as shall be equitable for the payment of costs."

And the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN C. SPOONER,
E. W. PETTUS,

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

TUESDAY, January 31, 1899.

The House met at 11 o'clock a. m. Prayer by the Rev. JAMES I. VANCE, D. D., of Nashville, Tenn.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army bill.

REPRINT OF A BILL.

Mr. ADAMS. A reprint of a bill, Mr. Speaker. I offer the following resolution for a reprint of a bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the House of Representatives 2,000 copies of the bill (H. R. 10524) with the report, No. 1460, accompanying the same.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, this resolution will be agreed to.

Mr. PERKINS. Is that the amended bill?

The SPEAKER. It is a proposition to print 2,000 copies. The Chair supposed it was for a simple reprint.

Mr. ADAMS. That is all.

The SPEAKER. This is not a simple reprint.

Mr. ADAMS. Then I will ask for a reprint.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Pennsylvania asks for a reprint of the bill (H. R. 10524) to increase the efficiency of the foreign service of the United States and to provide for the reorganization of the consular service and the report thereon.

There was no objection, and it was so ordered.

ARMY REORGANIZATION.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the Army bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. PAYNE in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the bill H. R. 11022, and the Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 12. That the Pay Department shall consist of 1 Paymaster-General, with the rank of brigadier-general; 4 assistant paymasters-general, with the rank of colonel; 8 deputy paymasters-general, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel; 13 paymasters, with the rank of major; and 34 paymasters, with the rank of captain: Provided, That all vacancies in the grades of colonel and lieutenant-colonel created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion, according to seniority, as now prescribed by law: And provided further, That persons who have served as officers of the Pay Department in the Volunteer Army in the war with Spain and persons in civil life may be appointed to positions in the grade of major created by this section, and such persons, prior to appointment, shall be examined as to their physical fitness for service only; but no such person shall be appointed to the grade of major after he shall have reached the age of 35 years, nor to the grade of captain after he shall have reached the age of 30 years.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out "forty-seven" and insert "thirty-five," so as to amend the committee amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to go back to line 21 and strike out "four," with the rank of colonel, and insert "three."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will suggest to go through with the committee amendments.

Mr. HULL. I am taking the section in order. The majority of the committee instructed me to offer these amendments. Strike out "four," in line 21, and insert "three."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. In line 22, with the rank of lieutenant-colonel, I move to strike out "eight" and insert "five."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. In line 24, after major, strike out "and 34 paymasters, with the rank of captain."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 4, page 14, after "served," strike out "as officers of the Pay Department."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Line 11, page 14, strike out "35" and insert "50."

Mr. MAHON. I move to amend that by making it 40.

Mr. SHAFROTH. There is nothing in the duties of a paymaster that requires him to be 50 years of age.

Mr. HULL. But he is retired at 64, and this makes a man give some service before he is retired.

Mr. HAY. There can be no objection to that amendment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. This was a committee amendment?

Mr. HULL. The original bill was 35, but yesterday the House by vote made it 40 in one place and 50 in another, and this puts it at 40.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Puts it at 40?

Mr. HULL. It is made 40. This is done in the case of the judge-advocates, and it ought to be made 40 so as to conform with the rest of the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. It seems to me that there ought not to be a change in this particular. I do not know as to the others, but I see no reason why a paymaster can not be 50 years of age and do good service.

Mr. HULL. They sometimes get to be 60 years.

Mr. LACEY. I will ask my colleague why we should not make it as the committee did, 35 years. The paymaster sees no hard service in the field, but just keeps the money and accounts.

Mr. STEELE. Make it uniform.

Mr. LACEY. It is not uniform. We have got it 40 in one place and 50 in another. We make it 40 in the case of a man who has seen hard service in the field. A man who goes out as paymaster may as well come in at 27.

Mr. TAWNEY. It is proposed, as I understand, to make all of them 40.

Mr. LACEY. No; it is not.

Mr. TAWNEY. Yes; it is.

Mr. LACEY. We have got beyond that.

Mr. TAWNEY. I think the House will give unanimous consent, and that is what the chairman proposes to do.

Mr. LACEY. That proposition is not made now.

Mr. MAHON. I understand it will be made.

Mr. HULL. I made the proposition, as far as I was concerned, that I would ask unanimous consent to go back and make it 40 all the way through.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Why not ask unanimous consent now?

Mr. HULL. We can do that, Mr. Chairman, after we get through with the bill. I do not propose to go back on what I said.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I have no doubt the gentleman intends to do it; the only reason for my proposition was that he could get consent now, and he might not be able to get it later.

Mr. HULL. Well, Mr. Chairman, in order to test that, I will now ask unanimous consent that where the age limit has been fixed in the staff department, in the Quartermaster's Department, and in the Judge-Advocate's Department, the only two places where it is fixed, these two which were passed at 50 years of age be made 40 years of age, so that they will have to serve twenty-four years before they reach the age of retirement.

Mr. MARSH. I object to that.

Mr. HULL. Then, Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON].

Mr. LACEY. I think this ought to be left as the bill was originally, at 35. I think we ought to vote down both amendments and leave it 35 years of age.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In line 11, page 14, after the word "years," strike out "nor to the grade of captain after he shall have reached the age of 30 years."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 14, line 9, after the word "their," insert the words "moral, mental, and;" and in the same line strike out the word "only;" so that it shall read "their moral, mental, and physical fitness for service."

Mr. GRIFFIN. We are unable to determine where that comes in.

The CLERK. On page 14, line 9, after the word "their."

Mr. HULL. That conforms to the amendments agreed to yesterday in the other corps, and I can see no objection to adopting it now.

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 13. That the Corps of Engineers shall consist of 1 Chief of Engineers, with the rank of brigadier-general; 10 colonels, 20 lieutenant-colonels, 36 majors, 41 captains, 50 first lieutenants, 50 second lieutenants, and 1 regiment of engineers, which, together with the officers serving therewith, shall be a part of the line of the Army: Provided, That vacancies in the Corps of Engineers created by this act in all grades above that of second lieutenant shall be filled, as far as possible, by promotion by seniority from the Corps of Engineers: And provided further, That officers of the Corps of Engineers shall not be eligible to promotion to the grade of captain until they shall have served at least five years as lieutenants: Provided also, That the remaining vacancies in the grade of captain shall be filled, subject to such physical and mental examination as may be prescribed by the Chief of Engineers and approved by the Secretary of War, by transfer of officers of the Regular Army of at least five years' service as such, or by appointment from civil life, or from the volunteer engineers, who have been in the regular practice of their profession as civil engineers for at least six years; and that the vacancies in the grade of first lieutenant shall be filled by promotion of second lieutenants of the Corps of Engineers and by transfer from the Regular Army, or appointment, as above prescribed for captains, excepting that the time limit in cases of transfers shall be three years and in cases of appointments four years, respectively, and that twenty vacancies in the grade of second lieutenant shall be left for future promotions from the corps of cadets of the United States Military Academy and the remainder filled by transfer from the Regular Army, or appointment, subject to such physical and mental examination as may be prescribed by the Chief of Engineers and approved by the Secretary of War.

The regiment of engineers shall consist of 1 sergeant-major; 1 quartermaster-sergeant; 1 commissary-sergeant, who shall have the pay and allowances of regimental quartermaster-sergeant; 3 battalion sergeants-major, who shall have the pay and allowances of first sergeant; a band, and 12 companies, organized into 3 battalions of 4 companies each.

The band of an engineer regiment shall consist of 1 chief musician; 1 principal musician; 1 drum major, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of first sergeant; 4 sergeants; 8 corporals; 1 cook; 12 privates.

Each company of engineers shall consist of 1 first sergeant; 1 quartermaster-sergeant, who shall have the pay and allowances of a sergeant of engineers; 9 sergeants; 15 corporals; 2 musicians; 2 cooks; 60 first-class privates and 60 second-class privates, and shall be recruited in the same manner and with the same limitations as are prescribed for the other branches constituting the military establishment: Provided, That such additional restrictions and limitations may be required as may be necessary for securing recruits specially fitted for the engineer service. And the officers of the regiment shall consist of 1 colonel; 1 lieutenant-colonel; 3 majors; 15 captains, including a regimental adjutant, a regimental quartermaster, a regimental commissary, and 12 company officers; 18 first lieutenants, including a battalion adjutant and a battalion quartermaster for each battalion and 12 company officers, and 12 second lieutenants, all of whom shall be detailed from time to time, when deemed necessary by the Chief of Engineers, from the Corps of Engineers.

Mr. HULL. I will ask unanimous consent to go to line 14 first, so as to keep it in consecutive order, and I move to strike out "ten" and insert "eight."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

In line 15 strike out "fifteen" and insert "twenty."

Mr. HULL. I move to amend that amendment by striking out "twenty" and inserting "sixteen."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

In line 15 strike out "twenty-five" and insert "thirty-six."

Mr. HULL. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out "six," so that it will read "thirty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The committee amendment as amended was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

In line 16 strike out "fifty-seven" and insert "forty-one."

Mr. HULL. I move to amend the committee amendment by striking out "forty-one" and inserting "thirty-five."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. I now move to strike out, in line 16, the word "fifty" and insert "forty," so it will make 40 first lieutenants.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. In line 17 I move to strike out "fifty" and insert "forty," so that it will make 40 second lieutenants.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, those are all of the committee amendments.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 5, page 15, after the word "such," the following: "or by appointment from civil life or from the volunteer engineers who have been in the regular practice of their profession as civil engineers for at least six years."

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, the object of this amendment is that the appointments to this corps shall be confined entirely to graduates from West Point—to exclude civilian appointments. It is known to every member of this House, I presume, that the Engineer Corps is made up of graduates who stand highest in their classes at West Point. They are the sifted-out and selected young graduates of this Academy, specially qualified for this particular work. The growth of the fortification and river and harbor improvement work, which has been going on steadily year after year, has made necessary a large increase in the engineer force of the Army, without reference to any question of foreign territorial acquisition. The natural needs of this country developed the necessity for this increase in this corps.

But gentlemen will see that under the amendments which have been adopted upon the suggestion of the chairman of the committee thirty-eight of the officers who were to be provided for had the bill as originally printed been passed are now dispensed with. It is a matter known to all that the number who are selected for this corps from each graduating class at West Point is usually limited to two or three, or at most four or five, standing highest in their classes. All the cadets at West Point have precisely the same training, the same instruction in engineering, the same instruction in every other branch that is taught there, and the dividing line between the boy who is selected to go into the Engineer Corps and the boy who is selected to go into another arm of the service, usually the ordnance or artillery, may be nothing more than a fraction of 1 per cent for the four years' study in that school. After graduating at the Academy, those chosen for the Engineer Corps are assigned to a special course of engineering at Willets Point for three years, and then their first active tour of duty as engineer officers commences.

Now, it seems to me, as there is so large an increase in this bill over the present number of engineers, the matter of filling the Engineer Corps may well be left to the future needs of the service; and a gradual increase in that corps may be made by assigning one or two more members of each graduating class at West Point to the Engineer Corps. This corps is the chosen corps of the Army. It is the object of every boy's aspiration when he enters West Point to be assigned to this corps. It is a grade that has reflected more credit, more honor upon the country than any other in the Army. In the entire experience of one hundred years or more of the existence of the American Army there has been but a single case of dereliction of duty on the part of an engineer officer resulting in charges being preferred against him. Could you expect such a record as this were the appointments made under the provision of this bill which I propose to strike out? Could you expect such a record from civilian appointees, considering the fact that so many of these appointees receive their places as the result of political influence?

The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. BERRY] called attention yesterday to this objectionable feature in other corps. If it be an objectionable feature in any corps of the service, it is especially so in this Engineer Corps, consisting of men to whom is intrusted the handling not only of these vast public improvements, in connection with which ignorance or dereliction of duty may result in the loss of thousands or millions of dollars, but the faithful disbursement of which depends upon the honor and integrity of the officer thus handling the funds of the Government.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman will allow me to suggest in the line of his present observations that the Government has recognized specially the integrity of this corps by exempting its officers from the usual requirement in regard to giving bonds.

Mr. BROMWELL. I was going to allude to that. As the gentleman from Missouri says, so high is the record of this Corps of Engineers, so much confidence has the Government placed in the officers of this special corps, that they have been exempted from the requirement applying to officers in every other department of the Government handling and disbursing the funds of the Government. In their cases a bond is not required to be given, although they handle millions of dollars in connection with public improvements every year.

Now, it seems to me there is no occasion for any provision for the appointment of officers of this corps from civil life. By this bill you add largely to the Engineer Corps, but you have an abundance of young men in the service who are graduates of the Military Academy who are qualified by their education to fill these places—young men in whom there has been created an esprit de corps unequaled and unrivaled in any army of the world. I hope this clause of the bill will be stricken out.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, General Wilson, Chief of Engineers, submitted the draft of this provision as it was submitted to the House. He stated in his formal examination before the committee and in conversation with members that on account of this increase in the corps there were going to be more vacancies than could be filled under existing conditions, even reserving the twenty positions for future graduates of West Point, and that men who had had six years' experience in civil engineering would be more competent for service on this corps than the average man whom you might pick up in the Army who had not been thus trained.

Now, the very minute a civil engineer is appointed in the Engineer Corps he becomes just as much a part of the Army as though he had graduated at West Point; and the man who has served six years in civil engineering, taking care of himself on public or private work, would not, it seems to me, materially lower the dignity of the Engineer Corps.

Mr. Chairman, I want to say further that I can not see the force of the argument that a man, simply because he has been educated at West Point, will prove himself any more honest than the man who has been taking care of himself outside of West Point. I concede the splendid record of this corps. I know that it is all that the gentleman from Ohio claims that it is. I know that it has had charge of marvelously large work and has discharged its duties in a marvelously faithful manner. But I object, Mr. Chairman, to the idea conveyed here that because a man has worked outside of the Army in the line of the same profession as the Engineer Corps he is, for that reason only, not worthy of trust. I do not think this House is prepared to take any such position.

Mr. STEELE. Does the gentleman think there is any more reason for exempting the officers of the Engineer Corps from the requirement of giving bonds than there is to extend a similar exemption to other officers of the Army?

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I care to answer the question of the gentleman, or to enter upon that branch of the discussion. As a rule, Army officers do not give bond, for they have their positions and commissions at stake——

Mr. DOCKERY. And their commissions may be taken from them under certain circumstances.

Mr. HULL. Certainly; their commissions are at stake; their reputation is at stake; the pride of the service is at stake; and it will not be possible for them to receive pay from the Government if there shall be any dereliction of duty on their part.

Now, this was not inserted on the idea of the committee itself; but was inserted at the suggestion of the Chief of the Engineer Corps, who is competent to give information and make suggestions on a matter of this kind, and who stated that there could be no possible objection to it, in his judgment.

Mr. RIDGELY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him for a question?

Mr. HULL. Certainly.

Mr. RIDGELY. Does not the gentleman think the proposed amendment wrong, in view of the fact that we must limit the number of appointments at West Point in order that engineers in civil life may get in who could not under this amendment? I think the amendment wrong, as it limits engineers to West Pointers. I hope it will be defeated.

Mr. HULL. I think it ought to be defeated.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, a single word in reference to the pending question. I hope the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] will prevail.

This bill is not being passed for an hour or for a day. It will probably stand for the next fifty years. At least we may hope it will not be necessary to legislate every few years upon this question.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman from Massachusetts will allow me to interrupt him at this point?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Certainly.

Mr. HULL. This is only, if the gentleman will notice, for promotion to these vacancies in the Engineer Corps.

Mr. BROMWELL. Let me suggest to the gentleman from Iowa, in response to his statement, that the man who goes into the Engineer Corps from civil life is going to stay in the Army. It is not a mere temporary appointment in his behalf, and the civilian who enters that service and remains for a sufficiently long time will in the end be a brigadier-general.

Mr. HULL. But how will you supply the vacancies? That is the question here.

Mr. BROMWELL. I answer the gentleman by saying that the suggestion in the bill will not meet the difficulty. There is no necessity for the change suggested here. The amendment is designed to meet the difficulty.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I would like to proceed in my own right a little while.

Above all other things, let me say to the committee, the country was shocked during the late war by the appointments made to various positions in the Army from civil life.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman thinks these appointments went too far——

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I do.

Mr. HULL. The appointments in the volunteer forces, the gentleman must remember, were made after a careful examination. This bill has reference to the Regular Army. Every appointment in the Regular Army is made after examination as to moral and mental qualifications and fitness.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. That may be, but I hope that these appointments will be confined to graduates from West Point in the future—to men who have been properly and technically trained, educated, and qualified for the performance of the duties to be assigned to them. There is no difficulty and no danger in making the appointments in that manner.

Mr. HULL. But the gentleman must remember that it would take some time to graduate a sufficient number of men.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. The men graduated at West Point, according to our experience, would be far better suited for these positions in the Regular Army, and we will have no cause to regret their appointment. We can afford to go slow in this matter. Some of the officers appointed from civil life during the civil war vindicated the wisdom of their appointment. Some of the most brilliant Army officers in the service came from civil life, and yet, as a matter of fact, such appointments as a whole cost us millions upon millions of dollars and scores on scores and thousands of lives as compared with other forces commanded by men trained and educated to a military life at West Point.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me to interrupt him just for a moment?

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. In a moment.

There is no profession, Mr. Chairman, which is so exacting, after all, as the profession of arms. So far as my observation goes, there is more required from military officers than from any other officers under the Government; and there is no other branch of the service of the Government where a technical, scientific education is so important as in the Army. As a matter of fact, the branch of engineers—the engineer arm of the service—is the most important, or if not the most important at least one of the most important, in the Army. It is on the engineer that the commander of the forces relies for information and judgment as to what can be done and what may not be done under the existing conditions.

I hope the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL] will prevail. I think we had as well, as we are legislating for a long time to come, adopt the very best propositions that can be submitted to us as a legislative body and give to the Government and the people of the United States the opportunity to secure the very best character of military services.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this amendment is exhausted.

Mr. MARSH. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MARSH. I hope that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio will not prevail. He assumes that the highest elements and qualities of a civil engineer are developed only at West Point, and in that he is wonderfully mistaken. The great engineering geniuses of the country never saw West Point. Take the bridge at St. Louis, constructed under the direction of Mr. Eads, that was pronounced by the members of the Engineer Corps to be a failure until the last tube was laid upon the arch.

Take the improvement of the Mississippi River at the Passes, proposed and carried into execution under Mr. Eads, whose proposition was hooted at and opposed by the Regular Army engineers. And I want to say to my friend from Ohio, notwithstanding that the Engineer Corps of the Army stands high, and justly stands high, I am in favor of allowing this bill to remain as it is, so that there may be injected into the Regular Army and into that corps some of the bright geniuses in civil life who did not have a Congressman willing to send them to West Point. [Applause.]

Mr. LACEY. Mr. Chairman, I hope this amendment will prevail, because it is in the line of sustaining the West Point Academy. That Academy has been an engineers' academy. It is an academy in which mathematics have always taken the highest honors. If a boy fails there in his French or Spanish or any of his other studies, he may have his time extended a year and be put back, but if he fails in mathematics he goes out of the service. That institution has given the closest attention to mathematical studies, and time and again we have had cadets appointed to the Engineer Corps who, after a few years' service in that corps, have resigned their places and gone into civil life because there they could get paid ten times as much as they could be paid in the Regular Army.

Mr. TAWNEY. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. LACEY. I have no time. Here is a proposition now that no man shall go into the Engineer Corps from civil life unless he has had six years' experience as an engineer in civil life. In other words, he must first have had six years in which, if he has been unable to practice his profession successfully, unable to make a success of it in civil life, he may apply for shelter in the Engineer Corps of the Army.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Six years' experience of that kind means six years' sitting around.

Mr. LACEY. If after six years he is successful as a civil engineer, he has a better position than a place in the Engineer Corps. If he is unsuccessful, he should not be placed in the Engineer Corps. Now, we have the whole Regular Army to draw from. There is no reason why the second lieutenants or first lieutenants or captains or various officers in the line of the Regular Army should not be advanced into this corps, which they aspired to while they were cadets at West Point.

Every boy is proud of graduating high enough to be eligible for appointment in the engineers. They are graduated there in proportion to their standing in their classes—first, the engineers; second, artillery; third, cavalry; and fourth, infantry; and when a young man sends word home to his family that he has graduated high enough to get into the engineers, it is a matter of pride to all his friends. Now, we have men, graduating a little lower, who aspire to the same places. They are eligible in this bill to some places, and there is no reason why these few vacancies in the Engineer Corps should not be held by those a little lower down, who have had the opportunities of the finest school in the world of its kind.

Mr. BROMWELL. And exactly the same training as those who did get in.

Mr. LACEY. Exactly the same training; and in addition to that some years of experience in the line. Let us at least keep the Engineer Corps where it now is—the ablest military organization in the world.

Mr. DOCKERY. I only desire to add a word to what has been so well said by the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] who has just taken his seat. I believe this amendment is in the right direction, because it will continue to divorce appointments in this corps from mere political influence. By actual experience it has been demonstrated, both in military and naval warfare, that the Government has always secured the best results where the Army and the Navy were wholly unvexed by the intrigues of political partisanship.

I think there is no Representative on this floor who is not proud of the brilliant achievements of our Navy during the recent war with Spain. Mr. Chairman, that great Department is presided over by Secretary Long, formerly a member of this House and personally known to all the old members, a man of large intellect and great executive capacity. He has directed our naval forces with consummate skill, which would have been impossible had he sought to subserve party interests at the expense of naval efficiency.

This amendment is timely, and Congress should continue to keep this Corps of Engineers, so distinguished in the military history of our country, wholly freed from importunities which simply seek the advancement of political favorites at the expense of the efficiency of our splendid Army.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move to strike out the last word, and will crave the attention of the committee for a very brief time. It will perhaps take ten minutes to say what I want to, but if at the expiration of five minutes the House does not desire to hear me further, I will not proceed.

Mr. HENDERSON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have ten minutes.

Mr. HULL. With the understanding that ten minutes will be yielded to the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent to proceed for ten minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. SIMPSON. I object. Let us treat all sides alike.

Mr. CANNON. Yesterday, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] gave notice of an amendment, if he could be recognized, and if not he would seek recognition to recommit this bill with the following instructions:

Provided, That no part of the Army constituted or organized under this bill shall be used for or shall do the duty of a posse comitatus, or be employed in putting down strikes or riots or do any police duty whatever in any State in this Union, except upon the application of the governor of such State to the President, stating that he has not sufficient force to maintain or restore order.

This is a new provision that the gentleman from New York has given notice that he will seek upon a motion to recommit or otherwise to write upon the proposed legislation, putting it out of the power, the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding, of the President to enforce the laws of the United States in the territory of any State of the Union unless the governor of the State shall certify to him that he has not sufficient force to suppress the riot. Now, then, it is well enough to ascertain what the law is, and what the object of the proposed amendment is, and what it would accomplish if it were written on the statute book.

First, I call the attention of the gentleman from New York and the House or committee to what the law now is. After a long contest, in 1879, upon an Army appropriation bill, this provision of the law was enacted, and is the law to-day, and for all time, unless repealed.

Chapter 263, section 15, Supplement of the Revised Statutes, volume 1, page 190, as follows:

From and after the passage of this act, it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus or otherwise for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress.

That is the law to-day, and has been since 1879. Now, what is the express provision of the Constitution?

The President shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed.

There is the constitutional provision; there is the legislation of 1879. Now, what happened heretofore and what may happen again? Take it in my own State of Illinois. A few years ago there was great trouble at Chicago. Railway trains were destroyed, public property and private property were destroyed, riots were organized, the laws of the United States were absolutely defied, all business was discontinued for weeks throughout the whole country.

Mr. DAVENPORT. Postal cars could not get in.

Mr. CANNON. The mails could not go on their way on the post routes of the United States. There was everywhere fear, doubt, demoralization, suspension of business, and loss of life.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CANNON. I hope my ten minutes have not been consumed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman only had five minutes.

Mr. TAWNEY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Illinois have five minutes more. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. CANNON. Now, under that legislation, which I have read, of 1879 the then President of the United States, without the consent of the governor of the State of Illinois, against his protest, used the Army of the United States to enforce the law of the United States, under the clause of the Constitution that he should "see to it that the laws were executed." Gentlemen recollect that occurrence.

The Senate of the United States, as I recollect it, without a dissenting voice, approved of the action of the President. The House of Representatives substantially approved of the action of the President. The whole country said that he had performed his duty in seeing to it that the laws of the United States were faithfully executed. Now, I have given the law, I think, on the subject to protect the citizen, the individual upon the one hand and to enforce the laws of the United States upon the other hand. But what does the gentleman propose to write new in the law? It is as follows. I will read it again:

Provided, That no part of the Army constituted or organized under this bill shall be used for or shall do the duty of a posse comitatus, or be employed in putting down strikes or riots or do any police duty whatever in any State in this Union, except upon the application of the governor of such State to the President, stating that he has not sufficient force to maintain or restore order.

If that had been the law when the late President enforced the laws of the United States in the State of Illinois, he would have had to suspend his constitutional functions until the governor of the State of Illinois, under his hand, certified to him that he had not sufficient force to maintain or restore order, when, in fact, the governor of Illinois did not enforce the laws of the United States, and protested against the President's enforcing the same.

There is no man in the country that will go further than I will to protect the individual citizen in all his rights of person and property, but I for one will not place it in the hands of one man, or 100 men, or 1,000 men, to set at defiance the laws of the United States and say to the President, the Constitution to the contrary notwithstanding, "You shall not enforce the laws of the United States until the governor first tells you to do so under his hand and seal." Within the boundaries of the United States the laws of the United States and its Constitution are supreme as against the action of any State executive or any State law. [Applause.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. This amendment would be unconstitutional if adopted.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman says this amendment would be unconstitutional if adopted. That is what I think, too; and that is one reason why it should not be adopted.

I say again, that the States, within their respective jurisdictions, are supreme, but that the National Government, where under its Constitution and laws it has jurisdiction, is the supreme power on earth, within our borders, save alone the power of Almighty God. [Applause.] And I want to say, in conclusion, that when this motion is made to recommit this bill, if it shall be made, I trust that upon both sides of the House the vote will be as it ought to be, "No," because every security is now given that can be given with the safety of the individual and the collective rights of all the people. [Applause.]

Mr. CUMMINGS rose.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] be given ten minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, there is no question whatever that organized labor in the United States, through the American Federation of Labor in national convention assembled, and through the Knights of Labor similarly convened, have condemned this effort to increase the standing army of the United States to 100,000 men. And there is no question whatever that the reason for their action is their fear that this standing army of 100,000 men may be used unconstitutionally in the way of oppression.

Mr. BRUCKER. Their fears are well founded, too.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Possibly. Now, if you mean to do it, say so; and if you do not mean to do it, adopt this proviso. You have an opportunity to allay their fears by its adoption, or to increase them by voting it down. I would like to see every man on the floor placed on record by a yea-and-nay vote, and regret that it can not be done in Committee of the Whole. I know that I will not get the opportunity to force the record in the open House, although I shall seek it.

The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], who referred to the action of Governor Altgeld, entirely failed to allude to the action of another governor of Illinois, John M. Palmer, who, in words as strong as those used by Governor Altgeld, denounced the action of the President of the United States in sending troops to Chicago without the sanction of the State authorities. A citizen of Illinois was killed by these troops in violation of the law. You had nothing in an army appropriation bill then under which you could excuse such action. The action was taken in violation of the Constitution of the United States. It was clearly shown by the protest of Governor Palmer, in a state document of rare excellence, to which I invite the attention of my distinguished friend from Illinois:

Mr. CANNON. Will the gentleman allow me right there, and I will ask an extension of his time if I take up too much of it? In the case of Governor Palmer the facts were these——

Mr. CUMMINGS. Never mind about the fact. The gentleman can make his statement of the facts in his own time, but not in mine. I have stated them myself in my own time, and my word is as good as his. Governor Palmer's statement can be placed on file.

Mr. CANNON. I ask unanimous consent, if the gentleman will yield at this time.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I will not yield.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman is afraid to yield for the truth.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Governor Palmer was not afraid to denounce a Republican President for his arbitrary action. Now, one word more in regard to the action of President Cleveland, whom the gentleman from Illinois says was sustained by the Senate of the United States. He says that the House of Representatives sustained his action and that the people sustained it. Well, the people got rid of him as quick as they could [laughter on the Democratic side], and they will not bring him into power again, even with the aid of the gentleman from Illinois. [Laughter on the Democratic side.] The constituted authorities of the State of Illinois denounced his action as arbitrary and revolutionary, and in defiance of the plain letter of the Constitution.

Now, sir, I am no lawyer nor banker, and make no pretensions to abstruse legal phraseology. I am a member of a trades union, and have been one for forty years, and claim to have the common sense characterizing members of New York Typographical Union, No. 6. I am going to apply the test of common sense to the gentleman's remarks.

Mr. SIMPSON. That will beat him. [Laughter.]

Mr. CUMMINGS. Article XIV of the Constitution says:

Congress has the power to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces.

You have the power, and here is the opportunity to do it, if you pay any attention to the expressed fears of organized labor in the United States.

Now, let us see what power the President has. "He shall take care that the laws be faithfully executed." Congress makes the laws, and it is the duty of the President to see that they are faithfully executed. There is no question whatever concerning the power of Congress to pass this proviso, and there is no question whatever that if the President of the United States refuses to execute its provisions he is in violation of the law and subject to impeachment. Read Article IV, section 4, of the Constitution of the United States, and see where we stand:

The United States shall guarantee to every State in this Union a republican form of government, and shall protect each of them against invasion; and, on application of the legislature or of the executive (when the legislature can not be convened), against domestic violence.

It was this provision that was violated when John M. Palmer was governor of Illinois. The same provision was afterwards violated when John P. Altgeld was governor; and both governors protested. Instead of protecting the State from invasion, the Federal Government itself invaded the State. The proviso which I have the honor to propose to this bill simply affirms the constitutional limit and gives an assurance of no further violations.

The plain facts of the invasion that occurred when John M. Palmer was governor of Illinois were these:

The great fire in Chicago began on October 8, 1871, and was stopped on the afternoon of the 9th. Thousands were homeless. Governor Palmer promptly sent provisions to the hungry and dispatched State troops to aid the police in preserving order. He also called an extra session of the legislature. The mayor of Chicago turned his authority over to General Sheridan without communicating with the governor of the State. Sheridan usurped command of the State military and brought in ten companies of United States troops to sustain his authority. The mayor usurped the authority of the police commissioners, and placed the police force under Sheridan's orders. Sheridan actually raised a regiment of volunteers in Chicago and placed them on duty, without even the knowledge or assent of the governor. One of these volunteers, under general orders, shot dead Col. Thomas W. Grosvenor, a prominent citizen, on the ground that he was a suspicious character and did not give one of Sheridan's countersigns.

Governor Palmer first learned of the mayor's action six days after General Sheridan had usurped authority. The governor was astounded, for he had been in Chicago immediately after the fire and had understood that Sheridan was acting as a private citizen and not as a military officer. The governor wrote the mayor, upbraiding him for not applying to him for military aid, and denounced Sheridan's action as illegal. He urged the mayor to resume his authority as soon as possible. The mayor did so on October 28. In his message to the legislature Governor Palmer said:

The mayor, the mere executive officer of a city created by the laws of this State, without control over the police, attempted to place the laws of the State under the feet of a citizen, who, forgetful of his own duty to respect, obey, and enforce the laws, in the capacity of an officer of the United States Army, availing himself of the color of authority conferred upon him by the mayor, subjected his fellow-citizens to military rule. No officer of the United States or of the State of Illinois has the constitutional or legal authority to exercise such transcendent powers, for Lieutenant-General Sheridan employed the troops of the United States in a manner not authorized by Federal laws. He raised troops without the consent of Congress and imposed upon them an unlawful oath.

But this was not all. On October 28, the same day that Mayor Mason resumed his authority, Joseph Medill, mayor-elect of Chicago, sent a note to General Sheridan requesting him to station four companies of United States troops in the city, saying that it would "deter evil-disposed persons from organizing a breech of the peace and reassure the public mind in an extraordinary degree." Instead of referring this request back to Governor Palmer, Sheridan telegraphed to the War Department for authority to bring the troops, laying special stress upon the fact that "Mr. Joseph Medill, the incoming new mayor," requested it. He received the following reply from the War Department:

Four companies of the Eighth Infantry are ordered to Chicago to act as police under your letter of the 29th.

General Palmer, in a letter to the President, protested, saying that the authorities of the State were able to maintain peace and order. He asked whether the troops were intended or instructed to obey the call of any of the authorities of the State or city or in any way to assume the protection either of property or the preservation of order in that city. The President replied that no reflections were meant upon the integrity or ability of any State officer or State or city official to perform his whole duty. The governor answered that he was unable to find anything in the President's letter justifying the extraordinary measure of ordering four companies of troops to act as police under Sheridan's orders.

The duty of preserving order rested with the State, and the Government could not interfere except upon the application of the legislature or the governor. Such interference violated the Constitution and the law. No emergency creating a sudden demand upon the powers and resources of a State operates to transfer any of them to the Government of the United States. The duty of the President is to see that the laws of the United States are enforced, and that of the Governor of Illinois is confined to the enforcement of the laws of the State. Neither obstructs the other, nor aids or interferes with his duties. The governor derives none of his powers from the United States, nor are his duties subjected in any respect to the consent or discretion of the President, who can in no way enlarge and prejudice or interrupt them, either by assuming them himself or by intrusting them to others.

In a letter written on April 16, 1872, refusing a Republican renomination for governor, General Palmer said:

I can not defend or justify the opinion acted upon by the President when he ordered four companies of infantry into this State to act as police, and that dictated his approval of the act of General Sheridan in raising troops by his own authority in this State, subjecting Chicago to military rule, whereby a peaceful citizen of the State was unlawfully killed. These lawless and dangerous assumptions of authority can not be defended or apologized for by me while an obligation or oath to support the Constitution and enforce the laws of the State rests upon me. If the powers claimed and acted upon by the President in these instances existed in him, the State of Illinois is but a dependency of the Government at Washington, and the laws and liberties of the people are subject to the will of the President.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us look at another case. In 1874 the governor of Louisiana applied for Federal troops to quell internal disturbances in that State. On January 4, 1874, by order of the governor these troops dispersed the lower house of the legislature on the ground that it was a mere mob, and the action of the troops was sustained and indorsed by the Administration at Washington. On January 15, 1875, a meeting was held in Faneuil Hall, Boston, to protest against this act of the Federal Government. Among the speakers at this meeting was the Hon. Richard Olney, Attorney-General of the United States when United States troops were sent into Illinois against the protest of Governor Altgeld. In his speech at Faneuil Hall Mr. Olney said:

Apparently the Administration meant to assert that the President might enter a State with troops to suppress disorder and violence at his own discretion, upon his own view of the exigency, and without waiting for the request or consent of the State itself. No more glaring attempt at usurpation can be imagined. If successful, it would revolutionize our whole governmental system and clearly annihilate the right of local self-government by a State.

Now, Mr. Chairman, let us come to the invasion of Illinois while John P. Altgeld was governor. The first trouble was in the coal mines. That trouble was stopped by the State militia, under the orders of the governor. While the coal strike was pending, the Hon. William J. Allen, United States district judge, of Springfield, Ill., finding that his marshal was having trouble to carry out some of the orders of his court, wrote to Attorney-General Olney at Washington upon the subject of receiving assistance from Federal troops. The Attorney-General sent the following dispatch:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 16, 1894.

ALLEN, United States Judge, Springfield, Ill.:

I understand the State of Illinois is willing to protect property against lawless violence with military forces, if necessary. Please advise receivers to take proper steps to procure protection by civil authorities of the State. If such protection proves inadequate, the governor should be applied to for military assistance.

OLNEY.

In his speech at Cooper Institute, October 17, 1896, Governor Altgeld said:

This dispatch of Secretary Olney set down the correct doctrine that the local authorities should be applied to first, and in case of their failure then the governor of the State should be applied to for assistance.

Immediately after the date of this telegram, and on several occasions thereafter during the coal strike, as well as on several occasions during the subsequent railroad strike, prior to the serious disturbances in Chicago, the United States marshal for the southern district of Illinois applied to the governor for military aid to enable him and his deputies to execute the processes of the United States courts, and in each instance troops were promptly sent to his assistance.

This shows the attitude of the State administration toward that part of the State lying outside of Chicago, and as troops were always promptly furnished where needed, and in every instance were promptly furnished to the United States marshal when asked for, to assist him in enforcing the orders of the United States court for southern Illinois, and as the State administration stood equally ready to furnish any assistance which the United States marshal at Chicago might require to carry out the orders of the United States court there, and inasmuch as Attorney-General Olney had only a few weeks before telegraphed that the governor should be applied to for troops to assist in carrying out the orders of the United States, it would naturally be expected that if the United States marshal at Chicago should need assistance he would apply for such assistance to the governor of the State. Instead of pursuing this course, just the opposite course was pursued. No application of any sort for troops was made to the governor by the United States marshal or any of the United States authorities at Chicago. Nor was any such application made by any of the local, city, or county officers of Chicago until the 6th of July, and then such application was made on my suggestion.

You may ask why the Federal Administration at Washington did not direct the United States marshal at Chicago to apply to the State for troops in order to enforce the orders of the United States courts there, just as the United States marshal for southern Illinois had applied to the State for troops to enforce the orders of the United States courts at that place. The Federal troops in Chicago were ordered to be in readiness five days in advance of any trouble, and were actually on the ground on the 3d day of July, before there had been any serious disturbance of any kind, and they remained on the ground for weeks.

Here, Mr. Chairman, are the official documents in the case:

EXECUTIVE OFFICE, STATE OF ILLINOIS, July 5, 1894.

Hon. GROVER CLEVELAND,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

SIR: I am advised that you have ordered Federal troops to go into service in the State of Illinois. Surely the facts have not been correctly presented to you in this case or you would not have taken this step, for it is entirely unnecessary, and, as it seems to me, unjustifiable. Waiving all questions of courtesy, I will say that the State of Illinois is not only able to take care of itself, but it stands ready to furnish the Federal Government any assistance it may need elsewhere.

Our military force is ample, and consists of as good soldiers as can be found in the country. They have been ordered promptly whenever and wherever they were needed. We have stationed in Chicago alone three regiments of infantry, one battery, and one troop of cavalry, and no better soldiers can be found. They have been ready every moment to go on duty, and have been and are now eager to go into service, but they have not been ordered out because nobody in Cook County, whether official or private citizen, asked to have their assistance, or even intimated in any way that their assistance was desired or necessary.

So far as I have been advised, the local officials have been able to handle the situation. But if any assistance were needed, the State stood ready to furnish 100 men for every 1 man required, and stood ready to do so at a moment's notice. Notwithstanding these facts, the Federal Government has been applied to by men who had political and selfish motives for wanting to ignore the State government. We have just gone through a long coal strike, more extensive here than in any other State, because our soft-coal field is larger than that of any other State. We have now had ten days of the railroad strike, and we have promptly furnished military aid wherever the local officials needed it.

In two instances the United States marshal for southern Illinois applied for assistance to enable him to enforce the processes of the United States court, and troops were promptly furnished him and he was assisted in every way he desired. The law has been thoroughly executed, and every man guilty of violating it during the strike has been brought to justice. If the marshal of the northern district of Illinois or the authorities of Cook County needed military assistance they had but to ask for it in order to get it from the State.

At present some of our railroads are paralyzed, not by reason of obstruction, but because they can not get men to operate their trains. For some reason they are anxious to keep this fact from the public, and for this purpose they are making an outcry about obstructions in order to divert attention. Now, I will cite to you two examples which illustrate the situation:

Some days ago I was advised that the business of one of our railroads was obstructed at two railroad centers, and that there was a condition bordering on anarchy there, and I was asked to furnish protection so as to enable the employees of the road to operate the trains. Troops were promptly ordered to both points. Then it transpired that the company had not sufficient men on its line to operate one train. All the old hands were orderly, but refused to go to work. The company had large shops which worked a number of men who did not belong to the railway union and who could run an engine. They were appealed to to run the train, but flatly refused. We were obliged to hunt up soldiers who could run an engine and operate a train.

Again, two days ago, appeals which were almost frantic came from the officials of another road, stating that at an important point on their line trains were forcibly obstructed and that there was a reign of anarchy at that place, and they asked for protection so that they could move their trains. Troops were put on the ground in a few hours' time, when the officer in command telegraphed me that there was no trouble and had been none at that point, but that the road seemed to have no men to run trains, and the sheriff telegraphed that he did not need troops, but would himself move every train if the company would only furnish an engineer. The result was that the troops were there twelve hours before a single train was moved, although there was no attempt at interference by anybody.

It is true that in several instances a road made efforts to work a few green men and a crowd standing around insulted them and tried to drive them away, and in a few other cases they cut off Pullman sleepers from trains. But all these troubles were local in character and could easily be handled by the State authorities. Illinois has more railroad men than any other State in the Union, but as a rule they are orderly and well behaved. This is shown by the fact that so very little actual violence has been committed. Only a very small percentage of these men have been guilty of infractions of the law. The newspaper accounts have in many cases been pure fabrications, and in others wild exaggerations.

I have gone thus into details to show that it is not soldiers that the railroads need so much as it is men to operate trains, and that the conditions do not exist here which bring the cause within the Federal statutes, a statute that was passed in 1881, and was in reality a war measure. The statute authorized the use of Federal troops in a State whenever it shall be impracticable to enforce the laws of the United States within such States by the ordinary judicial proceedings. Such a condition does not exist in Illinois. There have been a few local disturbances, but nothing that seriously interfered with the administration of justice, or that could not be easily controlled by the local or State authorities, for the Federal troops can do nothing that the State troops can not do.

I repeat, that you have been imposed upon in this matter, but even if by a forced construction it were held that the conditions here came within the letter of the statute, then I submit that local self government is a fundamental principle of our Constitution. Each community shall govern itself so long as it can and is ready and able to enforce the law, and it is in harmony with this fundamental principle that the statute authorizing the President to send troops into States must be construed; especially is this so in matters relating to the exercise of the police power and the preservation of law and order.

To absolutely ignore a local government in matters of this kind, when the local government is ready to furnish assistance needed, and is amply able to enforce the law, not only insults the people of this State by imputing to them an inability to govern themselves, or an unwillingness to enforce the law, but is in violation of a basic principle of our institutions. The question of Federal supremacy is in no way involved. No one disputes it for a moment; but, under our Constitution, Federal supremacy and local self-government must go hand in hand, and to ignore the latter is to do violence to the Constitution.

As governor of the State of Illinois, I protest against this, and ask the immediate withdrawal of the Federal troops from active duty in this State. Should the situation at any time get so serious that we can not control it with the State forces, we will promptly ask for Federal assistance, but until such time I protest, with all due deference, against this uncalled-for reflection upon our people, and again ask the immediate withdrawal of these troops.

I have the honor to be, yours, respectfully,

JOHN P. ALTGELD,
Governor of Illinois.

[President's reply.]

EXECUTIVE MANSION, Washington, July 5, 1894.

Hon. JOHN P. ALTGELD,
Governor of Illinois, Springfield, Ill.

SIR: Federal troops were sent to Chicago in strict accordance with the Constitution and laws of the United States, upon the demand of the Post-Office Department that obstruction of the mails should be removed, and upon the representations of the judicial officers of the United States that the process of the Federal courts could not be executed through the ordinary means, and upon competent proof that conspiracies existed against commerce between the States.

To meet these conditions, which are clearly within the province of Federal authority, the presence of Federal troops in the city of Chicago was deemed not only proper, but necessary, and there has been no intention of thereby interfering with the plain duty of the local authorities to preserve the peace of the city.

GROVER CLEVELAND.

[Governor Altgeld's second telegram.]

Hon. GROVER CLEVELAND,
President of the United States, Washington, D. C.

SIR: Your answer to my protest involves some startling conclusions and ignores and evades the question at issue—that is, that the principle of local self-government is just as fundamental in our institutions as is that of Federal supremacy.

First. You calmly assume that the Executive has the legal right to order Federal troops into any community of the United States, in the first instance, whenever there is the slightest disturbance, and that he can do this without any regard to the question as to whether that community is able to and ready to enforce the law itself, and, inasmuch as the Executive is the sole judge of the question as to whether any disturbance exists or not in any part of the country, this assumption means that the Executive can send Federal troops into any community in the United States at his pleasure, and keep them there as long as he chooses.

If this is the law, then the principle of self-government either never did exist in this country or else has been destroyed, for no community can be said to possess local self-government if the Executive can, at his pleasure, send military forces to patrol its streets under pretense of enforcing some law. The kind of local self-government that could exist under these circumstances can be found in any of the monarchies of Europe, and it is not in harmony with the spirit of our institutions.

Second. It is also a fundamental principle in our Government that, except in times of war, the military shall be subordinate to the civil authority. In harmony with this provision, the State troops are ordered out to act under and with the civil authorities. The troops you have ordered to Chicago are not under the civil authorities, and are in no way responsible to them for their conduct. They are not even acting under the United States marshal or any Federal officer of the State, but are acting directly under military orders issued from military headquarters at Washington, and in so far as these troops act at all it is military government.

Third. The statute authorizing Federal troops to be sent into States in certain cases contemplates that the State troops shall be taken first. This provision has been ignored, and it is assumed that the Executive is not bound by it. Federal interference with industrial disturbances in the various States is certainly a new departure, and it opens up so large a field that it will require a very little stretch of authority to absorb to itself all the details of local government.

Fourth. You say that troops were ordered into Illinois upon the demand of the Post-Office Department, and upon representations of the judicial officers of the United States that process of the courts could not be served, and upon proof that conspiracies existed. We will not discuss the facts, but look for a moment at the principle involved in your statement. All of these officers are appointed by the Executive. Most of them can be removed by him at will. They are not only obliged to do his bidding, but they are in fact a part of the Executive.

If several of them can apply for troops, one alone can; so that under the law as you assume it to be an Executive, through any one of his appointees, can apply to himself to have the military sent into any city or number of cities, and base his application on such representations as he sees fit to make. In fact, it will be immaterial whether he makes any showing or not, for the Executive is the sole judge, and nobody else has any right to interfere or even inquire about it.

Then the Executive can pass on his own application—his will being the sole guide—he can hold the application to be sufficient, and order troops to as many places as he wishes and put them in command of any one he chooses, and have them act, not under the civil officers, either Federal or State, but directly under military orders from Washington, and there is not in the Constitution or laws, whether written or unwritten, any limitation or restraint upon his power. His judgment, that is, his will, is the sole guide, and it being purely a matter of discretion, his decision can never be examined or questioned.

This assumption as to the power of the Executive is certainly new, and I respectfully submit that it is not the law of the land. The jurists have told us that this is a Government of law, and not a Government by the caprice of an individual: and, further, instead of being autocratic, it is a Government of limited power. Yet the autocrat of Russia could certainly not possess, or claim to possess, greater power than is possessed by the Executive of the United States, if your assumption is correct.

Fifth. The Executive has the command not only of the regular forces of all the United States, but of the military forces of all the States, and can order them to any place he sees fit; and as there are always more or less local disturbances over the country, it will be an easy matter under your construction of the law for an ambitious Executive to order out the military forces of all of the States and establish at once a military government. The only chance of failure in such a movement could come from rebellion, and with such a vast military power at command this could readily be crushed, for, as a rule, soldiers will obey orders.

As for the situation in Illinois, that is of no consequence now compared with the far-reaching principle involved. True, according to my advices, Federal troops have now been on duty for over two days, and although the men were brave and the officers valiant and able, yet their very presence proved to be an irritant, because it aroused the indignation of a large class of people, who, while upholding law and order, had been taught to believe in local self-government, and therefore resented what they regarded as unwarranted interference.

Inasmuch as the Federal troops can do nothing but what the State troops can do there, and believing that the State is amply able to take care of the situation and to enforce the law, and believing that the ordering out of the Federal troops was unwarranted, I again ask their withdrawal.

JOHN P. ALTGELD.

This correspondence speaks for itself, Mr. Chairman. It details the whole situation as clearly as it was detailed by Governor Palmer over twenty years before. Nothing that I can say can add to it or detract from it. It opened the eyes of the people, and no action taken in this or any other Congress can close them again.

Sir, I honor William McKinley, President of the United States, because he is unlike some of his predecessors. Governor Tanner, of Illinois, refused to order out the State militia to put down the strike at Pana. If Mr. McKinley's predecessor had been President, he would have immediately sent the Army there in defiance of the governor to quell that strike. But William McKinley, with a full sense of his duty and responsibility to the people, left the case in the hands of Governor Tanner, and the people of the United States honor him for it. If Governor Tanner finds himself unable to quell violence hereafter, he may call upon the President of the United States for aid, and William McKinley will furnish the aid.

I might make the same application to the recent riots in Wilmington, N. C. If we may believe newspaper reports, the President was urged to send United States troops into the State and put down the outbreak without reference to the State authorities. He stood, however, within the constitutional guaranty, awaiting the action of the State authorities, presenting a magnificent contrast to the action of former Presidents in Louisiana and Illinois. His course here will add more luster to his fame in the future history of the Republic than the capture of Santiago.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to delay the consideration of this bill. I do desire, however, to have the people of the United States, if possible, satisfied with the bill and its provisions. But I tell you now that I never, in my course of service in this body, will vote for a bill of this character unless this proviso has been placed in it. [Applause.]

All that I ask is that there shall be a vote on this proposition, a yea-and-nay vote, where gentlemen can be placed on the record, and let the people know where they stand and for what they want this proposed increase of the Army. If you do not intend to use the Army in the manner indicated, why not say so? What reason is there for avoiding the issue?

The gentleman from Illinois says, "The Federal authority was and should be supreme." I will amend this by saying, "The Federal authority is and should be supreme under the Constitution of the United States." And this is all that my proviso aims to do. We want it understood that the Army is not to be used unconstitutionally, even if the opportunity should arise, and that all the rights of local self government shall be preserved.

I hope that the gentleman from Illinois, like an honest man, will aid me in securing a vote on this proviso. It is his duty to do so; and it is my duty, as I believe him to be honest, to ask him to aid me in an honest endeavor.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Chairman, I move a formal amendment, to strike out the last two words.

The gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] has on this occasion, as before, called attention to the fact that he is a member of a labor organization. He has the right to be. Labor has the right to organize. Nobody disputes that right. American citizens, under the law and obeying the laws in the name of labor or in the name of anything that is legal and praiseworthy, have the right to organization. The gentleman in saying that he is a member of that organization has no advantage over the balance of us. Labor has trodden no path in this country that most of us have not trodden. Before we are lawyers or doctors or laborers or professional men we are American citizens; and the law of the common country, like the grace of God, covers us all and must be obeyed by all. [Applause.]

Now, what is proposed by the gentleman? To declare that when a law of the United States is trampled under foot, spat upon, derided, and defied—when the business of the whole country may be stopped by one man or one thousand men, headed, not by labor (because labor suffers under such circumstances), but headed by the anarchist and the bad man, who is in defiance of the law of the United States—the gentleman proposes that the execution of that law should remain in abeyance until the particular governor of that State says in black and white, under his hand, to the President that he has not the power to keep the peace. That is what the gentleman proposes.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I propose no such thing.

Mr. CANNON. And then he says that Cleveland was repudiated notwithstanding he enforced the law. We did not elect Cleveland; you did. [Laughter.] But it is the one green spot in his record that when the law was defied, not only by the lawbreaker, but by the anarchist, and when the governor of the State would not enforce the law or call upon the President to do so, Cleveland said, "I must keep my oath under the Constitution and see that the laws are faithfully executed." The gentleman proposes, if it be possible, in this proposed statute to put that out of the power of the President; and he undertakes to speak in the name of labor. He slanders labor. [Applause.] Such cheap demagogy in the name of labor will be spat upon by every honest laborer and citizen throughout the length and breadth of the country. [Applause.]

In the little time I have remaining I want to state one thing in justice to the late Governor Palmer.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has two minutes remaining.

Mr. CANNON. The gentleman tells us that Governor Palmer did get into trouble—really into trouble. What were the circumstances? A great city, Chicago, was being destroyed by fire. The telegraph wires were down. The governor was 150 miles away. He might just as well have been 5,000. There was fear, doubt, no police, demoralization, death everywhere; thieves fattening, the city being destroyed, new fires being set. There happened to be there a company of soldiers. From necessity, in the absence of police, law or no law, in the presence of that overpowering necessity, a line of soldiers was thrown across the street. That is all there is of it. And, as suggested to me, with General Sheridan in command. The gentleman is not happy; the late Governor Palmer was not happy because the honest people of this country recognized in that great emergency that it was right to stop the thieves and to protect property.

Now, that is all I want to say about that. The gentleman would not let me correct him when I sought the opportunity to do so.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The papers will correct you.

Mr. CANNON. He did not pursue his usual courteous course.

Mr. Chairman, I do not know that I desire to add anything further.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, words can not make misstatements true; and all the ability of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] in the use of words shall not place me or any other man in the United States in a false light if I can prevent it. I say that the governors and legislatures of the States have their rights; the Executive of the United States and Congress also have their rights. If the Executive of the United States overrides the rights of the governors or State authorities, as the gentleman from Illinois has admitted they did in the case of Governor Palmer, the State authorities have an equal right to override the acts of the Executive. Law is law, and it must be obeyed. The only object in the world that I had in offering this proviso was to see whether this Congress would abide by the clear enactment of the Constitution of the United States. All who are willing to do so will vote for this amendment. If they desire an evasion of the terms of the Constitution, they will vote against it.

One word more and I am through. I honor William McKinley, President of the United States, because he is unlike some of his predecessors. Governor Tanner, of Illinois, refused to order out the State militia to put down the strike at Pana. If Mr. McKinley's predecessor had been President, according to your plain statement, he would have immediately sent the Army there in defiance of the governor to quell that strike. But William McKinley, with a full sense of his duty and responsibility to the people, left the case in the hands of Governor Tanner, and the people of the United States honor him for it. If Governor Tanner finds himself unable to quell the strike, he may call upon the President of the United States for aid, and William McKinley will furnish the aid. I might make the same application to the recent riots in Wilmington, N. C. If we may believe newspaper reports, the President was urged to send United States troops into the State and put down the outbreak without reference to the State authorities. He stood, however, within the constitutional guaranty awaiting the action of the State authorities.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not desire to delay the consideration of this bill. I do desire, however, to have the people of the United States, if possible, satisfied with the bill and its provisions. But I tell you now that I never, in my course of service in this body, will vote for a bill of this character unless this proviso has been placed in it. [Applause.]

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, with the consent of the gentleman from New York, I would like to make a suggestion.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I yield to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES. I read from McPherson's Handbook of Politics for 1878:

Be it enacted, etc., That from and after the passage of this act it shall not be lawful to employ any part of the Army of the United States as a posse comitatus, or otherwise, for the purpose of executing the laws, except in such cases and under such circumstances as such employment of said force may be expressly authorized by the Constitution or by act of Congress; and no money appropriated by this act shall be used to pay any of the expenses incurred in the employment of any troops in violation of this section; and any person willfully violating the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and on conviction thereof shall be punished by fine not exceeding $10,000 or imprisonment not exceeding two years or by both such fine and imprisonment.

In the House this was carried by a vote of 154 to 48.

And the distinguished gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON] voted for that provision, as this standard authority shows. That was a provision almost identical with the provision in controversy here.

Mr. CANNON. Oh, the gentleman knows that I read that provision of the law myself.

Mr. CUMMINGS. You did not read it all. That is as strong a provision as this, and you voted for it.

Mr. GAINES. That was the reason that I read it. The gentleman did not read the whole of it, and the gentleman's position to-day is not the same evidently as it was when he voted for that act in 1878.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Ohio be again reported.

The amendment proposed by Mr. BROMWELL was again read.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I hope that amendment will not prevail. It ought to be rejected by the committee.

This bill deals very liberally with the engineer force of the Army. This is particularly true with reference to vacancies which will exist when the bill becomes a law. All of these vacancies have been filled heretofore, and subsequent vacancies when they arrive will be filled under the law as it now exists. There is an increase of 43 in the engineer force.

Mr. HULL. And, if my friend will permit me to make a suggestion in that connection, 20 are reserved for future appointment.

Mr. MARSH. Certainly.

Mr. BROMWELL. That is for second lieutenants: Now, I am opposed to putting them in as captains over the heads of other officers——

Mr. HULL. Oh, the gentleman understands, of course, the order in which such appointments will be made.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, I must decline to be interrupted for a moment or two.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois declines further interruption.

Mr. MARSH. Without going more particularly into the clause, I only desire to call the attention of the committee to the fact that the gentleman is undertaking by the proposed amendment to make the Engineer Corps of the whole Army the only one in the service into which a civilian may not be appointed.

Mr. BROMWELL. Why, Mr. Chairman, a civilian is appointed to West Point by each member of Congress every four years.

Mr. MARSH. What a wonderful discovery the gentleman from Ohio has made and has interloped into my remarks! [Laughter.]

The Quartermaster-General's Department, the Ordnance, the Commissary—in fact, every other department of the Army, and all of them, are open to the introduction of new and civilian blood; and yet the gentleman from Ohio would make a restriction in this particular case.

What does his amendment do? It proposes to exclude from this department all such appointments. What relationship does the gentleman from Ohio possess to the Engineer Corps that he should make that a "close corporation" and forever forbid the introduction of civilian blood into the corps, when every other corps is opened, under the law as it exists to-day, to the introduction of properly qualified civilians?

Mr. BROMWELL. Will the gentleman allow me to answer just here?

Mr. MARSH. The gentleman, of course, can answer in his own time. I have but a few moments.

Now, if the proposition of the gentleman from Ohio is enacted into law, the engineers will be confined, at least for a time, to drafts on the graduates of the Military Academy, when all of the other departments of the Army are opened, under proper restrictions and in view of proper qualifications, for the enlistment or appointment of civilian blood. If the gentleman, therefore, will tell in his own time what particular connection he has with the Engineer Corps to induce him to single that corps out and make it a close corporation against the introduction of civilian blood, I will be exceedingly glad to have it done.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman from Illinois asks a personal explanation as to what particular interest I happen to have in the Engineer Corps of the Army to single out that corps for the operation of this particular amendment.

I assume, of course, that the gentleman from Illinois refers to the fact that I have a son in that corps of the Army. If so, I wish to assert, as a matter of fact, for his information and for the information of the House, that there is no provision in the bill and nothing in the amendment suggested by myself that will affect in any manner his position in the service of the Government.

Under the law as it now stands he will receive his next promotion inside of a year, and it will be many years before he gets another, whether this bill passes or does not. So much now for the personal matter that the gentleman alluded to.

I want to say that I am opposed to the introduction of civilians into any arm or branch of this service if there are Regular Army officers to fill the places by promotion.

Now, I want to call attention to this provision of the bill, commencing at the first line, on page 15:

> That the remaining vacancies in the grade of captain shall be filled, subject to such physical and mental examination as may be prescribed by the Chief of Engineers and approved by the Secretary of War, by transfer of officers of the Regular Army of at least five years' service as such—

Now, this is the objectionable clause that I want stricken out—> or by appointment from civil life, or from the volunteer engineers who have been in the regular practice of their profession as civil engineers for at least six years.

Mr. HULL. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. BROMWELL. Excuse me now. I will answer the gentleman's question when I get through. That proposes to put into the regular Engineer Corps, in the grade of captains, men from civil life, while you have first lieutenants who have served at least four years, or second lieutenants who have been serving in the Regular Army, who are all graduates of West Point, who have had four years' training in the Military Academy, and some of them three years in their special branches, to fit them for this service.

Now, I object to putting into this choice corps, the corps upon which every boy who enters West Point fixes his eye as the goal of success, the corps to which only two or three men of a class are assigned, and they the star pupils of that class, while below them the boys are assigned to the other corps—I object to putting into this corps men from civil life, who have not had this training, to outrank these boys. I say, give these other boys, down to the tenth place, a chance to get into the Engineer Corps.

The gentleman says we are increasing this corps by 43. We do not need that increase all at once. It does not make any difference if we do not make the whole increase for the next ten years.

Mr. HULL. Let us reduce the number, then.

Mr. BROMWELL. We do need the increase, but we do not need 43 men all at once. If we add 20 men to the Engineer Corps this year, they can take charge of public improvements and advance them better than has been done for the last two or three years. An addition of 10 men would be a valuable acquisition to this corps. Now, why the necessity of filling all these 43 places at once and filling them up with civilian officers? As the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. LACEY] very well said, it proposes to fill these places with civilians who have had six years' experience. And what does that mean? That if a young man has made a success as a civil engineer with six years' experience, he has an income that will make an army position no object to him or not very desirable. On the other hand, if he has not made a success, are we going to put him into the Army instead of the boys whom we have trained to do this special work, who have made their life work the study and profession of engineering in the Army?

In the matter of quartermasters and commissaries, no great damage would be done if they did make a mistake occasionally, as they undoubtedly did make mistakes in the appointment of the volunteer officers in the late war, but when it comes to these great engineering works, controlling the courses of great rivers like the Mississippi, the building of fortifications along the seacoast which involve the expenditure of millions of dollars annually, millions of dollars of the people's money, I say to you you can not be too particular as to the men whom you put into this corps.

Now, as to any personal relations to this corps, I want to say that I have just as much interest in the other corps as I have in this, but I did not feel inclined to take the time of the House when the other corps were under discussion to state my objections. I do object to a civilian getting into any branch of the service as long as there is a trained, expert, Regular Army officer to fill that position, and I do especially object to putting into this corps as captains men who are going to outrank the first lieutenants and second lieutenants, your boys and my boys whom we have appointed to West Point, whose high standing and special abilities have fitted them for this very purpose.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Mr. Chairman, I want, in in the name of my constituents, to protest against the false representations as to labor and the position of labor on the maintenance of good order made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS]. I have not been a member of any labor organization for forty years, of any name or nature; but I have encouraged legitimate labor organizations in every way in my power for forty years, long before they were recognized in the position which they now hold. I claim the same right to represent labor on this floor as the gentleman from New York has, and I protest against the position in which he puts organized labor, in declaring that it was the laborers and the legitimate strikers who constituted the rioters at Chicago. I deny any such proposition. It was the hoodlums, the rowdies, and the anarchists in that city who took advantage of organized labor at that time.

I would like to ask the gentleman if he desires that those classes who always take advantage of a strike, when a controversy exists between the laboring people and their employers, to create anarchy and riot, and bloodshed and murder, and to set fire should be represented here as the true laborers of this country? Let me say to this House that there is no class in the community that is so much interested——

Mr. CUMMINGS rose.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. Let me have my five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Massachusetts declines to be interrupted.

Mr. CUMMINGS. You asked me a question.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. There is no class in the community that is so much interested in having order maintained as the men on strike in a community. There is no class in the community that is so much interested in having rowdies, murderers, and thugs, and anarchists put down by the proper authority—the Army of the United States if need be—when there is a strike as the laborers connected with the strike. You will have all strikes suppressed, you will have the right to strike denied, and labor organizations entirely wiped out if you can not have a force sufficient to keep order when a strike is on. And I want to say to the gentleman from New York that while he may be authorized by his organization to appear here with such an amendment——

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman is not authorized by anybody but his own conscience.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. I want to say to him that even this great Congress has made mistakes, the greatest and wisest bodies of the world have made mistakes, and that any labor organization is making a fatal mistake when it proposes any such amendment as the gentleman proposes to this bill. All the murders, bloodshed, fires, and all the anarchy that occurred in Chicago were created not by the honest men who were then on strike, but by the vicious element of Chicago. In the name of honest labor I repudiate any such position as is proposed, and I repudiate here the idea that such proposition as that correctly represents the great body of wage earners in this country.

Mr. CUMMINGS. The gentleman asked me a question, and I would like to have an opportunity to answer.

Mr. HULL. You can get it in a few minutes, on the next section. I want to close debate on this.

Mr. CUMMINGS. It will only take a quarter of a minute.

Mr. HULL. I only want to say to my friend from Ohio his remarks would form a splendid basis for a reduction of this corps at least 35 more, without in any way doing violence to the whole corps, and having said this much, I now move that all debate on this section and all amendments thereto shall be closed.

Mr. COX. Yield to me for two minutes.

Mr. HULL. You can get in on the next section.

The question was taken; and the motion of Mr. HULL was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the ayes seemed to have it.

Mr. HULL. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 99, noes 70.

Mr. HULL. I will simply give notice that I will demand a yea-and-nay vote on this amendment in the House.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out after the word "lieutenant," in line 17, the words "and one regiment of engineers, which, together with the officers serving therewith, shall be a part of the line of the Army."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14 strike out in lines 17, 18, and 19 the following: "and one regiment of engineers, which, together with the officers serving therewith, shall be a part of the line of the Army."

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. STEELE. Let us have a division, Mr. Chairman.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 98, noes 1.

Mr. BROMWELL. I would like to call the attention of the chairman of the committee——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on the section and all amendments thereto is closed.

Mr. BROMWELL. I merely ask to correct the section by reason of striking out the words "or appointment" in lines 17 and 18 on page 15.

Mr. HULL. You can make that motion. Amendments are in order.

Mr. BROMWELL. I move to amend by striking out, in line 17, page 15, the words "or appointment;" so as to make it conform to the action already taken in regard to the amendment of the other part of the section.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 15, lines 17 and 18, strike out the words "or appointment."

Mr. BROMWELL. And also the same words on line 11 of that page.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "years," in line 8, page 15, the words: "Provided, That no such person shall be appointed from civil life or the volunteer engineers after he shall have reached the age of 40."

Mr. HULL. What is that?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will again report the amendment for the information of the committee, without objection.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. HULL. I raise the point of order against that. We are not legislating for volunteers in this bill. The men put into the volunteer corps are in the Volunteer Army now. They are in the Regular Army. It is not germane.

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman state his point of order?

Mr. HULL. The point of order is that this amendment relates to the volunteer engineers.

Mr. MAHON. I will modify it.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair can not hear what the gentleman from Iowa says.

Mr. HULL. "The gentleman from Iowa" says that this is proposed to limit the age for volunteer engineers. This is not a volunteer bill, and we are not making any provision for volunteer engineers.

Mr. MAHON. You are taking men from civil life.

Mr. HULL. There can none of them be taken from civil life.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON] is proposing to amend a clause that has been stricken out on a motion of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BROMWELL].

Mr. MAHON. But the gentleman from Iowa gave notice of a yea-and-nay vote in the House.

The CHAIRMAN. That does not make the gentleman's amendment germane to the bill now.

Mr. MAHON. If the committee's action in the House is sustained, this amendment could be voted down.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee having stricken that out, the gentleman's amendment is not germane to that part of the bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I want to suggest that the amendment offered by the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. STEELE] should be modified, and I understand he is preparing to alter it and offer it in another place. I think the gentleman struck out the words "one regiment of engineers," which should have been left in the bill. He did not intend to have that stricken out, I know.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the words "and one regiment of engineers" be left in the bill. That was stricken out by my amendment in line 17, page 14.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order. We can not hear.

The CHAIRMAN. The point of order is well taken. All gentlemen will be seated and cease conversation. The gentleman from Indiana asks unanimous consent to amend the amendment just adopted on his motion in accordance with what the Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 14, line 17, reinsert the words "one regiment of engineers."

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the adoption of this amendment? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none. The Clerk will read the next section.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 14. That the Ordnance Department shall consist of 1 Chief of Ordnance, with the rank of brigadier-general; 5 colonels; 8 lieutenant-colonels; 12 majors; 29 captains; 28 first lieutenants; the ordnance storekeeper now authorized by law, and the enlisted men, including ordnance sergeants, as now authorized by law: Provided, That upon the death, retirement, or other separation from active service of the ordnance storekeeper now in service the office of ordnance storekeeper shall cease to exist: And provided further, That all vacancies created or caused by this section shall be filled by promotion and appointment as now prescribed by law.

The Clerk read the first committee amendment, as follows:

In line 2 strike out the word "five" and insert "six;" so that it will read "six colonels."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

In line 3 strike out the word "twelve" and insert "sixteen;" so that it will read "sixteen majors."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

In line 4 strike out the word "twenty-nine" and insert "twenty-six;" so that it will read "twenty-six captains."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next committee amendment, as follows:

In the same line, line 4, strike out the word "twenty-eight" and insert "twenty-six;" so that it will read "twenty-six first lieutenants."

The committee amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, there are no further committee amendments.

Mr. LLOYD. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in lines 7, 8, 9, and 10, page 17, the following: "Provided, That upon the death, retirement, or other separation from active service of the ordnance storekeeper now in service, the office of ordnance storekeeper shall cease to exist."

[Mr. LLOYD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, the proviso the gentleman seeks to strike out has been the law of the United States for a great many years. The officer that is filling the place filled it during the civil war, was in active discharge of his duties, and is yet performing duties of the Ordnance Department. He is filling a place where he has no promotion. There have been repeated propositions to give him promotion.

Now, the gentleman says you can not discharge men that are once in the United States Army. Why? The law of 1870 mustered out 600 officers when the infantry regiments were reduced from 45 to 25. The effect of striking out this proviso would simply be to continue the office of ordnance storekeeper forever, and would defeat the very object the gentleman claims in his speech to have. It is a limitation under the proviso that when this man dies there shall be no further appointment in that line. Strike it out and you leave the law making an ordnance storekeeper necessary, and the result is you continue the office when you do not need it under the modern organization.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I wish to call attention to two propositions which I shall address to the sense of this House in respect to the matter of promotions under this bill. Under the bill, as now substantially arranged, promotions will go by seniority. Now, let us get at this matter practically, so that we may understand exactly how this measure is to work. A brigadier-general, we will suppose, is placed upon the retired list. Then there comes promotion to the senior colonel next below him; then to the lieutenant-colonel, the major, the captain, and the lieutenants. Now, consider for a moment the enormous amount of money which this system of promotions is going to involve—a system by which on the retirement of one of your leading officers the salary of every officer in regular line below him is increased.

Think of the expense! Yet the idea is calmly tolerated in this House that upon retirement of a leading officer—I am supposing the retirement of a brigadier-general, for illustration—every officer, proceeding downward in a regular line, receives promotion with an increased salary, until you strike the lowest man, who may be a noncommissioned officer, and to him you give the position of second or third lieutenant. Is that the proper way to conduct our Army in time of peace? Why, Mr. Chairman, with my convictions plain and distinct upon this matter, I do not hesitate to say that in a year or two, by reason of your pension establishment and your large retired list, and your promotions of various officers, taking effect as soon as this bill becomes law, you will have an Army which, with the pension roll, will cost the people of the United States not less than $300,000,000 a year.

I pass from that to another point, and then I am done; for there is not a single thing in this bill that I approve, from top to bottom. It all proceeds on the wrong principle. Let me recur for a moment to the discussion which took place this morning between my friend from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS] and my friend from Illinois [Mr. CANNON]. That discussion developed the fact—and there is no escape from it—that the President is to have power to decide (overruling the determination of the governor of a State, if necessary) when disorder prevails in that State calling for Executive intervention. That seems to be the policy of gentlemen on the other side. In spite of the fact that the governor may say, "I will maintain peace; I will maintain order; I will take care of my people," the President may step in and say to the governor, "You are not pursuing a course that is satisfactory to me; and I will put the troops of the United States on the soil of your State without your invitation or suggestion."

I do not care whether the man taking part in the disorder is an anarchist, or, as suggested by my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER], a murderer. That is not the point with me. The point with me is this: The governors of the States are charged with the control of their people; and I object seriously to the Government of the United States putting its hand upon the citizen of a State and taking him into a Federal court when there are the laws of the State to be executed and enforced. I do not want any more central power in this Government by means of the Army or the laws of the United States.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Mr. Chairman, I do not think the pending amendment reaches the purposes that the gentleman who offered it had in view.

Mr. LLOYD. Will the gentleman allow me a moment? In order to accomplish the purpose which I had in view in offering the amendment, I accept the idea advanced by the chairman of the committee, and will modify my amendment so as to insert, after the word "law," in line 6, the words "is hereby abolished;" so that it will provide that the office of ordnance storekeeper as now authorized by law shall be abolished.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Missouri asks unanimous consent to withdraw his former amendment and substitute that which will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after the word "law," in line 6, the words "is hereby abolished."

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair hears no objection to the proposed modification.

[Mr. MAGUIRE addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. BAKER of Illinois. Mr. Chairman, at a former session of the Committee of the Whole I had occasion to present, in a very brief manner, the general view which I hold in opposition to the bill now before us. I now desire to add some further remarks in opposition to the idea or project of establishing a colonial policy for the United States, and in further opposition to the pending measure, both of which I regard as extremely pernicious, as being in violation of the most salutary principles and policies of our system of government. I feel sure that there is no room in our American institutions for the European plan of colonial government—absolutely no room for a fixed and permanent difference in the political status of our citizens; and I feel equally sure that the present raising of our standing army to 100,000 men would be a very costly, uncalled-for, and dangerous step in the wrong direction.

A sort of opinion has suddenly grown up among us which invites us to imitate the English colonial policy—a policy which in the evolution of civilization is of a lower type than the American policy. The English system rests upon monarchy, inequality, aristocracy, and rank. The American system rests upon democracy and equality, and severely excludes legalized aristocracy and rank. The movement of civilization has been from Asia to Europe and from Europe to America, each step heading toward a larger regard for total humanity in political organization. For substantial classification it may be said that Asia has been the seat of patriarchies and despotisms; that Europe has been the seat of monarchies, aristocracies, aristocratic republics and military republics; whilst the institutions of America have been consecrated to democracy—using this word in its scientific, political sense. Here is an ascending scale, wrought out during the four or five thousand years of recorded history. Now we are invited by some to surrender the higher American ideal for the lower European. This would be one of the most lamentable self-degradations in the history of mankind. But it will not be. The progressive world movement, which has been so true to itself, working from continent to continent for thousands of years, will not be arrested by the insensate, superficial, and mischievous jingoism which now proposes to break the upward career of our Republic, and set its downward pace to a degrading imitation of the lower European ideal, which it has long ago left behind.

The attempt to suddenly sweep us into a colonial policy similar to that of Great Britian—so suddenly that we have scarce time to note where the leap will carry us—is, in my opinion, the most audacious and reckless performance of jingoism that this or any other country has ever witnessed. It is totally without reason to support it and grossly violative of all reason. Our adoption of the British colonizing policy would obviously suppose a fundamental similarity of conditions in Great Britian and the United States. There is no such similarity, but decidedly the reverse. The British constitution conforms to the European type; ours to the American. The individual units under the British constitution are subjects; under ours citizens.

The British constitution is adapted to the conquest and government of colonies; ours clearly not. Great Britain is insular; the United States continental. Great Britain consists of a small group of islands, with only 121,000 square miles of surface and surrounded by an angry sea; the United States covers between three and four million square miles of surface, with the prospect of pacifically doubling it in a period of time measured by decades rather than centuries, if we only remain true to our American ideal. The United States has her vast domain of republican liberty at home; Great Britain has had to go forth over the seas of the world in quest of her empire. She has done so with wonderful ability and success—in Australasia, in India, in Africa, in the Dominion of Canada, and in the islands of the sea scattered here and there all over the globe. She is the modern representative of the ancient Romans improved by two thousand years of time and by the humanizing influence of Christianity. When her great rôle shall have been finished—when Australasia, India, Africa, and Canada shall have gone their respective ways—there can be no doubt that the verdict of history will be that she has made larger compensations for the spoliations and wrongs of conquest than any other conquering nation, ancient or modern. I wish to speak with impartial veracity. I wish to recognize the work of Great Britain at its highest value. She has carried the European ideal to the forefront. But, supported by the reason springing out of the entire progressive movement of civilization, from Asia to America, I affirm that our American ideal is higher than the European—a distinct stage of evolution beyond the European—and that it is our sacred duty, under God and to all humanity, to be loyal to that ideal and to perform a higher rôle than that of Great Britain on the plane of the world's history. This can not be done by a mean surrender of our ideal and an ignoble imitation of that of England.

Our Republic ought to respect that just comity which is as essential to good feeling between nations as between individuals. Rationally looked at, our national estate is already greater than that of any other nation, ancient or modern. It is superior in its appointments to any of the Indo-European empires, whether those that have passed away or those that now exist. The Persian Empire extended at one time from the Indus to the islands of the Ægean Sea and from the Persian Gulf and Indian Ocean well up into the continent of Asia, but was in no sense comparable to the United States. The Roman Empire extended from the British Islands to the Tigris or the Euphrates, and from the cataracts of the Nile to the Rhine, with a land area, as Gibbon estimates, of about 1,600,000 square miles and a population of about 120,000,000. But great and famous as this empire was, it was decidedly inferior to the United States as a physical basis of civilization. The Russian Empire, in point of unbroken geographical extent, is the largest that has ever been dominated by one power, but the inferior quality of 5,000,000 square miles of this vast territory, its boreal location on the globe, and its great rivers flowing to the Arctic Ocean and frozen over during nine months of the year, demonstrate that as a physical basis for a world-modifying civilization it is much inferior to the United States. The British Empire, in the sum of its geographical measurements, is the largest that the world has ever seen, and it controls in various ways, a population of nearly 400,000,000. But this great empire goes straggling in broken fragments all around the globe, and is evidently a comparatively transitory phenomenon. The continental base of the United States is permanent, with the prospect of vast continental extension by peaceful means, and even with present resources sufficient for the support of a half billion of people. With this great heritage already in hand we should certainly pursue a policy of decent comity toward all other nations, and we should certainly not pursue a policy the effect of which would be to alienate the good feeling of our traditional friends—France, Germany, and Russia—in exchange for an informal or actual alliance with Great Britain, whose obvious motive at the present time is to secure the direct or indirect aid of the United States in floating her vast and unstable empire. Great Britain has no considerable allies on the continent of Europe. Any combination of powers that should succeed in beating her at sea would be able to dissolve her empire. Hence her wooing of the United States to become in a sense her copartner by mitating her colonial policy. We should have none of this. We should adhere to our own system, which is greater, higher, and better than that of Britain. We should treat England and all other nations with equal friendliness and justness, thus drawing to us the equal friendliness of all and the enmity of none whilst pursuing our own destiny in our own American way.

Undoubtedly the United States may properly expand by the annexation of additional territories and people that can be assimilated to our system of government; but it is certain that the United States can not properly expand by the addition of territories and people that can not be so assimilated, especially distant territories inhabited by a numerous people. We have had instances of the first sort in the acquisition of the great Louisiana territory, in the acquisition of Florida, in the annexation of Texas, and in the acquisition of territory from Mexico. We should have a clear instance of the second sort by the acquisition of the Philippine Islands. These islands lie in a tropical sea, not far from China and Japan, in the storm center of Europe's Eastern question, and more than 10,000 miles from this capital. Their inhabitants, numerous enough for a considerable nation, are placed at eight to ten millions in number. They belong to an ancient Asiatic race, and are fossilated in the heredity of thousands of years. No one pretends that they have proper adaptability to republican institutions as we understand them. No one pretends that they should ever be incorporated as States in our Union. The whole theory of annexing these islands proceeds upon the supposition that their inhabitants should be permanently held as an inferior class of American citizens; and this I declare to be in gross violation of the central principle of our Government. Whether the Filipinos desire to occupy such an abnormal position in our system or not, we want no such abnormalities on any terms. But when it is added that all the information we have about them is to the general effect that they do not so desire, the purpose of annexing them would become in the last degree scandalous and un-American. Annexation of the Philippines would be a diseased instead of a healthy expansion of our Republic. It would be the artificial fastening of a big extraneous fungus upon our body politic, diffusing blood poison into the healthy part. All sensible political surgery would aim at excising such a fungus if it were once attached, but it seems that we have political doctors who would do the bad service of fastening it on.

I will conclude by saying that in view of the imperialistic spirit which has so suddenly grown up among us, in view of the enormous increase of the standing army which is urged upon us, and in view of the threatened degradation of our American ideal in imitation of that of England, it is high time that the sober second thought of our people were doing its effectual work in correction of the evil tendencies of the hour.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate upon the pending section and all amendments thereto be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. VINCENT. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk as an amendment to the pending amendment of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

In section 14, page 17, strike out all after the word "Provided," in line 7, to the word "and," in line 10, and insert therefor these words: "The office of ordnance storekeeper is hereby discontinued."

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, that is not an amendment to the amendment. I make the point of order that it has no relevancy to the pending amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman proposes it as a substitute.

Mr. HULL. The amendment as read does not touch the paragraph in question. It may come in afterwards.

Mr. VINCENT. Very well; let it be withheld for a moment. I will offer it subsequently.

The CHAIRMAN. The question, then, is on the first amendment, which is proposed by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. LLOYD], and on which debate has been closed.

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment proposed by the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. VINCENT].

The amendment was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now report the amendments proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs.

The several amendments recommended by the Committee on Military Affairs to the paragraph in question were considered and agreed to, until the amendment in line 8 of the paragraph was reached.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment in line 8.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out "thirty-five" and insert "fifty."

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend the amendment of the committee by striking out "fifty" and inserting "forty."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendment as amended was agreed to.

The next amendment proposed by the committee was read, considered, and agreed to.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, now I offer the amendment to which I called attention heretofore, as a separate section, according to the agreement made on yesterday.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment proposed by the gentleman from North Dakota.

Insert after line 4, page 12, the following:

"And provided further, That no officer or private soldier shall be detailed to sell intoxicating drinks, as a bartender or otherwise, in any post exchange or canteen, nor shall any other person be required or allowed to sell such liquors in any encampment or fort or on any premises used for military purposes by the United States."

The CHAIRMAN. Does the Chair understand that the gentleman offers it as a separate section?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. As a separate section.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from North Dakota.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, this amendment is the essential feature of what has been known to two sessions of this Congress as the Ellis bill "to prohibit the sale of intoxicating liquors on any reservation or in any building under control of the United States Government," but confines its application simply to military camps, forts, and reservations. That bill has received the unanimous report of the proper committee of this House, the Committee on Alcoholic Liquor Traffic. It comes here on the authority of a committee report, and, in the absence of the chairman of the committee and the gentleman from Oregon [Mr. ELLIS] who introduced the bill I have been requested by both these gentlemen to present this matter to the House.

The principle involved in this bill has been supported by more petitions than any other measure before this Congress.

PROTESTS OF THE PRESS AGAINST THE OUTRAGE.

AN ABOMINATION.

The army canteen attached to regiments is an abomination in the sight of God and all men not either mentally or physically besotted.—New York Christian Advocate.

THE CANTEEN A DEMORALIZING THING.

The canteen system, in full blast in many regiments in our various camps is a most demoralizing thing.—Central Christian Advocate.

CANTEENS MORE DANGEROUS THAN SPANIARDS.

A more dangerous foe to our brave soldier boys than the Spaniard is the system known as the army canteen, which ruins them morally as well as physically.—Northern Christian Advocate.

WHY ALLOW THE CANTEEN TO CONTINUE?

Now that leading officers and men of widest experience who are most interested in the United States Army are practically agreed that the sale of liquor in the canteens weakens the efficiency of the Army and undermines the health of the soldiers, what reason remains for permitting the business to continue?—The Congregationalist.

FATTENING THE POCKETS OF DISTILLERS AND BREWERS.

The shame and iniquity of the sale of liquor to soldiers in their camps have been emphasized throughout our land. Every consideration of health and good morals demands that it should come to an end. Of course the whole whisky and beer force of the United States will fight for the privilege of robbing and debauching our soldiers and making them the easy victims of deadly fevers; but we believe that our Army was recruited for a higher purpose than that of fattening the pockets of distillers and brewers.—Herald and Presbyter.

WOUNDS AND DEATH NOT THE WORST FATE.

To be wounded or killed is not the worst fate that can befall the volunteer or the worst sorrow that is likely to come to those he left behind, if the sale of liquor is permitted or winked at by those who have the power to prohibit it.—Inter-Ocean.

TOO MUCH WHISKY GUZZLING IN ARMY CAMPS.

There is altogether too much whisky guzzling in the army camps anyhow, and there are too many "canteens." They should all be abolished at once. The more canteens there are in the Tropics, the worse for the men's health and morals.—Chicago Tribune.

THE WHOLE BUSINESS INEXCUSABLE.

Young men heretofore innocent and free from the temptations of the open saloon, or with sufficient good influences around them at home to save them from the snare, are, in these regimental saloons, brought face to face with the evil, and overcome. The whole business is inexcusable and ought to be stopped.—Christian Advocate, Nashville.

THE WORST FOE.

Our soldier in camp and on the field has three chief enemies: First, the foe he goes out to meet in the Spanish forces; second, disease, which lays him low, saps his strength, and stealthily hunts for his precious life, and third, the canteen. By overwhelming testimony the last is in many ways the worst. The others are honorable foes, never known as other than foes, but the last comes as a friend, as a needed helper; is provided by the Government and managed by men wearing the uniform of the nation's defenders.—City and State.

This section has the support of every general in our Army who has publicly expressed himself on the question except one, and that is General Eagan. With all due respect to that gentleman, none the less on account of his present humiliation and misfortune, I am permitted, with all due courtesy to him, to say that his opinion and judgment as to what is good for the stomach of a soldier, both as to meat and drink, have less weight and authority than prior to his court-martial.

As against General Eagan, I have here the opinion of Major-General Miles, the opinion of Adjutant-General Corbin, the opinion of Major-General Wheeler, the opinion of Major-General Shafter, and of many other officers of high rank in our Army, all opposed to the sale of intoxicating liquors in the army canteens:

Major-General Miles, in General Orders, No. 87, issued at Washington, July 2, 1898, says: "The history of other armies has demonstrated that in a hot climate abstinence from the use of intoxicating drink is essential to continued health and efficiency.

"Commanding officers of all grades and officers of the medical staff will carefully note the effect of the use of such light beverages—wines and beer—as are permitted to be sold at the post and camp exchanges, and the commanders of all independent commands are enjoined to restrict or to entirely prohibit the sale of such beverages if the welfare of the troops or the interests of the service require such action.

"In this most important hour of the nation's history it is due the Government from all those in its service that they should not only render the most earnest efforts for its honor and welfare, but that their full physical and intellectual force should be given to their public duties, uncontaminated by any indulgences that shall dim, stultify, weaken, or impair their faculties and strength in any particular.

"Officers of every grade, by example as well as by authority, will contribute to the enforcement of the order."

Major-General Shafter, from Santiago, writes:

"I have always been strongly opposed to the canteen system or the sale of intoxicating drinks of any kind on military reservations, and have opposed it until absolutely overruled and required to establish a canteen at my post. I regard it demoralizing to the men, besides impairing seriously their efficiency.

"The plea that it furnishes a large sum, which it does, to improve the table fare of the men is, in my opinion, a very poor one, as the Government of the United States is perfectly able to feed its men without any assistance from the profits of rum selling. I have absolutely prohibited the sale of liquor or the opening of saloons in the city of Santiago, and have refused permission for cargoes of beer to come from the States here."

Adjutant-General Corbin: "A cause of restlessness (in the Army) is traced to the excesses of the exchange, the saloon feature of which is not productive of good and should be done away with without further experiment. The sale of beer, superintended by a commissioned officer and served by noncommissioned officers and soldiers, is not conducive to discipline, nor is it a picture that can be submitted to the people for their approval."

Major-General WHEELER:

"I am a thorough believer in temperance in all things and am utterly opposed to soldiers being sold intoxicating liquors, and I believe that every effort should be exercised to remove the temptation of such dissipation from them."

Bvt. Maj. Gen. O. B. Willcox (retired):

"It is my opinion that the public good, as well as personal character of those concerned, would be enhanced very much by the exclusion of liquor from the rank and file of the Army except under due medical prescription."

Brig. Gen. D. S. Stanley, United States Army:

"It is my deliberate opinion that our Army now entering upon a campaign in a hot climate would be immensely better off if all alcoholic drinks were prohibited."

Brig. Gen. William B. Rochester, United States Army (retired):

"There is no doubt that the drink habit works very great injury to the Army. It has been shown over and over again that those who endure the greatest fatigue and exposure are the men who do not drink."

Winfred T. Durbin, colonel commanding brigade, Panama, Fla.: "As colonel of the One hundred and sixty-first Indiana Volunteer Infantry, I have not permitted a canteen. My observation and information from those who have had them is that they are not approved of, only as money-makers."

THE CANTEEN IN THE REGULAR ARMY.

Adjt. Gen. Henry C. Corbin, United States Army, in his official report in 1892, when he ranked as assistant adjutant-general, said:

"A cause of restlessness [in the Army] is traced to the excesses of the exchange, the saloon feature of which is not productive of good, and should be done away with without further experiment.

"The sale of beer superintended by a commissioned officer and served by noncommissioned officers and soldiers is not conducive to discipline, nor is it a picture that can be submitted to the people for their approval. The men who drink spend the greater portion of their money for beer. The credit system brings them to the pay table with little or no money due. This takes all heart out of them, and makes them quite ready to ask their discharge and try some other calling."

Lieut. A. K. Taylor, then of the Ninth Infantry, in the United Service Magazine for April, 1892, said:

"What is this institution but one of licensed idleness, with the attraction of beer, cards, dice, billiards, and other kindred solicitations to extravagance and dissipation? The young recruit, fresh from the rural districts, of whom we hope much from his enlistment, is met on the threshold of his military life with the invitation to waste his money, become a beer drinker, a card player, a dice thrower, and an idler of his time. We may, and doubtless will, return him to civil life, if we limit him to one enlistment as now proposed, enfeebled in body, weakened in mind, and morals tainted—the end a ruined manhood."

WASHINGTON, D. C.

ABSTINENCE BEST FOR THE NAVY, TOO.

In my opinion there can be do question that the public good would be greatly enhanced by the exclusion of alcoholic drink as a beverage from both Army and Navy circles. The man who needs the stimulus of alcoholic liquor to enable him to perform his duty is not to be trusted in any capacity.

In my experience of nearly fifty years as an officer in the United States Navy I think I can safely say that 90 per cent of all punishments inflicted on board ship have come under my observation can be traced directly to rum.

I. H. GIBBS, Commodore, U. S. N.

ALEXANDRIA, VA.

I should say, as a naval man, that alcoholic liquor could be dispensed with with advantage, except for medical purposes. In the Navy the grog ration has been abolished for years and coffee substituted in the early morning before any work is done. I look upon alcoholic drinks as medicine and should only be used as such.

L. A. KIMBERLY,
Rear-Admiral, U. S. N. (Retired).

The Second Mississippi Regiment of Volunteers has no canteen. The majority of the regimental officers were in favor of it, but when it came to Col. A. A. Montgomery he said: "As a canteen can not be established in this regiment without my signature, you can not get that signature and will have to be content without it."

Colonel Candler, of the Georgia Volunteers, arrested a man for selling liquor in his camp, tried him under military law, and sent him to prison. If we had more Candlers, we should have fewer "canteens."

Col. Theo. Burchfield, of the Fifth Regiment of Pennsylvania Volunteers, when at Camp Thomas, was approached by parties who sought to introduce the canteen in his regiment. His reply was: "No; never can the canteen come into my regiment. My boys are not to be tempted to the use of intoxicating liquor."

Colonel Kreps, of the Fifteenth Pennsylvania Volunteers, when approached by a company of brewers, who wanted to open a canteen in his regiment at Camp Meade, very promptly and emphatically said "No!" When he was thanked by the ladies of the Woman's Christian Temperance Alliance, he said: "I can assure you that the canteen has never been regarded by us as the proper thing for our soldier boys, and we have yet to learn any argument in its favor."

Col. William Jennings Bryan, McKinley's competitor for the Presidency, when pressed by brewers to allow a canteen to be opened in his regiment, the Third Nebraska, emphatically refused and there was no saloon in his camp.

In this roll of honor we place the names of Colonel Gaither, of the Second Kentucky; the colonel of the One hundred and sixtieth Indiana, the colonel of the Twenty-first Kansas, at Camp Thomas; the colonel of the Second Virginia, and the colonel of the First Wisconsin, at Camp Cuba Libre.

General Harries, of this city (as reported in the Post of January 28), said:

In Cuba, the First District Volunteer Regiment, which was the only one which did not establish a canteen, lost but 8 men—less than any other command around Santiago.

NO DELIRIUM TREMENS IN THIS REGIMENT.

We operate a canteen in our regiment, but sell no beer, wine, or any other liquor. Am informed that ours is the only canteen in Manila that sells no beer. We have had but three deaths from disease. Our death rate is lower than any other organization, and the same is true of our sick list.

W. C. TRENMANN,

Commanding the Regiment.

MANILA, PHILIPPINE ISLANDS, November 29, 1898.

Milo B. Ward, major and surgeon, United States Volunteers, Kansas City, Mo., September 23, 1898, wrote:

"I have had good opportunity to observe the effects of beer on the health of the men in the Second Division, Third Army Corps, and I am forced to confess that it was one of the features of camp life which caused the medical department much concern. I was some of the time medical officer of the day, and in that capacity I visited and inspected the entire division.

I urged in each report made that the canteens be closed. I found the troops who drank beer suffered from malarial jaundice, and many of them were very ill.

I can not say that a limited quantity of beer would have been injurious, but the quantity can not be controlled if canteens are permitted to be open. Many of the regiments found it necessary to close their canteens.

Capt. R. S. Woodson, Government expert on tropical diseases, in a special report on yellow fever during the recent war, said:

So firmly convinced am I of the predisposing influence of alcoholic indulgences toward the disease that I would strike all such beverages from the dietary of the soldier, and even from the medical supplies of the department.

GENERAL KITCHENER'S VICTORIOUS ABSTAINERS.

The British army has gathered the first experimental evidence bearing upon this military temperance question. Three regiments were selected from each of several brigades for tests at different times, partly during maneuvers. In one every man was forbidden to drink a drop while the test lasted; in the second malt liquor only could be purchased; in the third a sailor's ration of whisky was given to each man.

The experiment was repeated in several instances where forced marches and other hard work was required. The whisky drinkers showed more dash at first, but generally in about four days showed signs of lassitude and abnormal fatigue. Those given malt liquor displayed less dash at first, but their endurance lasted somewhat longer. The abstainers, however, are said to have increased daily in alertness and staying powers.

As a result of this experiment the British war department decided that in the recent Soudan campaign not a single drop of stimulant should be allowed in camp, save for hospital use. The officers, including even the generals, could no longer enjoy their accustomed spirits, wines, and malt liquors at their mess tables. There must have been some wry faces, especially among the Scotch laddies, when the order was published that for all hands, including even camp followers, liquid refreshment was to be limited to tea, oatmeal water, or lime juice and Nile water.

To-day it is a great feather in the headgear of the advocates of military total abstainers that Lord Kitchener's recent victory was won for him by an army of teetotalers, who made phenomenal forced marches through the desert, under a burning sun and in a climate famed for its power to kill or prematurely age the unacclimated. Indeed, 'tis said that never has there been a British campaign occasioning so little sickness and profiting by so much endurance.—Washington Star.

Hon. William S. Caine, M. P., of England, at a reception in New York City on October 20 last, stated that Lord Roberts, commander in chief, had said to him that one-third of the British army in India, 24,800 out of 75,000, furnish 2,000 more effective troops than the other two-thirds, who are not abstainers.

In a speech before the English Army Temperance Association, Lord Wolseley said:

There are yet some battles to be fought, some great enemies to be encountered by the United Kingdom, but the most pressing enemy at present is drink. It kills more than all our newest weapons of warfare, and not only destroys the body but the mind and soul also.

Mr. SETTLE. Will the gentleman permit a question?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Certainly.

Mr. SETTLE. Does the amendment carry any penalty for its violation?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. No, sir.

Mr. SETTLE. Then of what avail will it be to adopt it without a penalty attached to it?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. It would have this avail——

Mr. SETTLE. The moral effect?

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. It is now a regulation controlled by the colonels of the various regiments. A mere suggestion from this high forum that it is the wish of the American people to banish the canteen would instantly banish it from all our regiments. Colonel Bryan refused to allow the canteen in his regiment to sell intoxicating liquors.

There is another feature which must appeal to the sense of justice and to the innate love of liberty among Americans, and that is the proposition in this amendment to relieve volunteers from the duty of becoming bartenders against their wishes, and in many instances not only against the laws of the place where the camp is located, but against the standard of the laws of the State from which they volunteered.

These young men volunteered to fight the battles of their country, not to be compelled to serve as bartenders, to deal out intoxicating liquors. In several instances of this kind where soldiers, from conscientious scruples, have refused to serve as details to sell beer, they have been court-martialed. Such requirements are against the enlightened conscience not only of the country, but of members of this House.

The New York Independent says:

We have been informed by private correspondence from some of our soldiers at the front that they are detailed by their officers to serve behind the counters of the canteens as bartenders, in spite of their protests, in disobedience to their home training and their conscience.

Some of them have been placed in the guardhouse because they choose to obey their conscience rather than the arbitrary authority of their officers, an authority which our laws surely never created and a service for which our Christian boys never enlisted. This sort of thing is an outrage that must be stopped.

I wish to submit not only the opinions of experts in military affairs, but petitions and editorial entreaties from both the secular and the Christian press of the country, from many bishops of different churches, from that great organization, the Woman's Christian Temperance Union, which has pleaded with the committees of this House, pleaded with the officers of the Army, and pleaded with every department of the Government where their voice could be heard for the abolition of this drink traffic in the Army, this compulsory service of our volunteers behind a bar; and with the permission already granted by this House, I will extend my remarks in the RECORD and add this evidence, this testimony from the military, from the Christian, and from the civil economic authorities of the United States:

THE VOICE OF THE PEOPLE AGAINST THE CANTEEN OUTRAGE.

Any attempt to regulate the sale of intoxicants in the Army or elsewhere is wrong and can only lead to wrong. Better the pestilence in the regiment than the saloon.—Bishop Merrill, Methodist Episcopal Church.

It endangers the health, the morals, and the efficiency of the soldier, and ought to disappear from our military camps and posts.—Bishop Andrews, Methodist Episcopal Church.

As a Christian minister, I beg, in the name of the health and morals of our Army, that the canteen order be revoked without delay.—Bishop Newman, Methodist Episcopal Church.

A Christian nation ought not to tolerate the demoralization and destruction of body and soul involved in the army canteen.—Bishop Mallalieu, Methodist Episcopal Church.

The establishment of the army canteen is a backward step in Christian civilization. It will be a source of great trouble to us if not abolished.—Bishop McCabe, Methodist Episcopal Church.

It seems a cruel thing to place temptations in the way of our noble soldier boys who are away from the kindly and restraining influences of the home and the home church.—Bishop Ninde, Methodist Episcopal Church.

Through it many young soldiers have been made drunkards and some have been led to crime. It is damaging to the Army and disgraceful to the country.—Bishop Bowman, Methodist Episcopal Church.

I wish to enter my solemn and religious protest against the outrage of this regimental "canteen" system in our army camps. I can not understand why it should be permitted for a day. Dividing the profits of such drink shops with the "regimental treasury" is the harvest of the devil and his imps.—Bishop T. M. Lenihan, Roman Catholic Church.

I believe that beer sales at army canteens should be prohibited by the military authorities. Total abstainers from all intoxicants make better soldiers, are more amenable to discipline, and have greater powers of endurance than stimulated men.—Rev. J. M. Cleary, President Catholic Total Abstinence Union of America.

[Mr. MUDD addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I wish to occupy the time of the committee for a very few moments. I want to correct what I believe is a misunderstanding in the minds of some of the members in regard to this bill. The impression has been left since the so-called Marsh amendment was adopted that this bill only provides for 50,000 men. If I understand the condition of the bill correctly, this bill provides for 100,000 men, namely, the commissioned force, 3,932, as we find in the report, and enlisted force, 96,933 men, a total of 100,865 men. Now, that is what the bill provides for. The Marsh amendment, if I understand it, provides that the President may in his discretion reduce it to 50,000 men. That is an entirely different proposition from what gentlemen suppose the bill stands for, of 50,000 men. It puts it at 100,000 men, and there is a responsibility on the President of the United States to reduce it to 50,000 men.

Nobody with any sense will suppose that he will ever reduce it to 50,000. What do men in position of trust and power like? What do they hang on to most tenaciously? It is power. This gives the President a new and unheard-of power. Do you think he will break all the records and give up power when once granted to him? There is no instance in history where men have laid down power once given to them.

I want members to understand that they can not fool anybody. I know my genial friend from Iowa [Mr. HENDERSON] apparently was opposed to the bill because it proposed 100,000 men. He, along with the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CANNON], very ingeniously has suggested and left the impression that this bill only provides for 50,000. Let it be understood that it provides for 100,000 men and that there will be no reduction unless the President sees fit to make the reduction. I hope that when members vote they will vote with that understanding that they will vote for a bill that provides for 100,000 men for the Regular Army.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman allow me a suggestion?

Mr. SIMPSON. No; I have but a minute. Now, it has been disclosed here this morning indirectly that they want it in part to suppress domestic violence. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. CURTIS] the other day admitted as much, and the gentleman from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER] has admitted it several times. That is what they want it for, along with a scheme for colonial empire, and to place on the throne in this country William McKinley, President of the United States, Emperor of the West Indian Islands and of the Philippines, and then get a standing army to enforce the power of this new empire. Empire! Do gentlemen understand the meaning of the word "empire" as applied to a republic? It means that we are taking the first step toward that strong centralized power that will finally result in this Republic being turned into an empire. It is no new disclosure in the history of the world. Step by step, gradually, the strong mailed hand of power is ever reaching out to clutch the power from the hands of the people. This is only one of the first steps you are taking in that direction, and I hope members will vote for this bill to go back into the hands of the committee, so that it can come back providing for an army of only 50,000 men and leave the responsibility in the hands of the President of the United States to raise it to 100,000. Then we would see if he dare do it.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, there can not be any difference of opinion as to what this bill provides for when it shall have been completed. When peace shall have been declared, when the treaty shall have been ratified and the proclamation of peace put forth following that treaty, the Regular Army of the United States will consist only of 26,610 enlisted men. My amendment not only authorizes, but directs the President to increase to 50,000 enlisted men in the infantry, cavalry, and artillery—compels him to do it; requires him to do it—and then permits him, in addition thereto and in accordance with his judgment and discretion, in view of emergencies that may come or that may now be upon us, to increase it to about 100,000 enlisted men; and it further authorizes him when he shall have increased it, if he does increase it above 50,000—that he may in his discretion decrease it back to 50,000 again.

There can be no question as to the meaning and effect of this bill when it shall have become a law. Now, Mr. Chairman, a great deal has been said here as to what this army is to do. I speak for myself, when I say this army is to be used to retain possession of the territory of the United States, Porto Rico, and the Philippine Islands. They are ours, they are ours by conquest, and when that treaty shall have been ratified, the title to that territory by conquest will be reenforced, if it need reenforcement, by a quitclaim deed from Spain, who did own the sovereignty of those islands. So far as I am concerned, I want to hold those Philippine Islands, and I want a portion of this army used for the purpose, if it becomes necessary.

Mr. GAINES. Do you want to hold it permanently?

Mr. MARSH. Let the gentlemen of the House understand, and the people of the country understand it, and the people of the country will indorse this Administration and will indorse this Congress if it takes the ground that the islands that we have captured in the Philippines and in the West Indies outside of Cuba shall be retained not as a part of the United States, but as the property and public domain of the United States.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Will the gentleman from Illinois permit a question?

Mr. MARSH. Yes; I will listen to the gentleman's question.

Mr. MAGUIRE. If the islands to which the gentleman has referred are not to be a part of the United States, but merely its property, what will be the political relations of the President of the United States in governing them and the subjects there?

Mr. MARSH. I will say to the gentleman that the political rights that the people of Porto Rico or of the Philippine Islands may have hereafter depends upon this Congress or the Congresses hereafter to come. Those people have and will have no political rights except such as may be conferred upon them by the legislation of Congress. And what is true in that respect of those islands has been true with all other territory that we have possessed from 1803 down to the present time, excepting that in the acquisition of those other territories there was a provision in the treaties that secured the people of the territories certain rights, while there is no such provision in the recent treaty with Spain. So that, Mr. Chairman, the inhabitants of these islands recently belonging to Spain will be entitled to only such political rights as Congress in its wisdom may from time to time in the future confer upon them.

Mr. HULL. I move that all debate on this amendment be closed in ten minutes.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. GROUT. Mr. Chairman, I wish to submit a word in support of the pending amendment, which proposes to abolish the canteen, and I will start not with my own words, but by reading from the language of certain military officers high in rank, and first from an order issued by General Miles July 2, 1898, in which he commences by saying:

> The history of other armies has demonstrated that in a hot climate abstinence from the use of intoxicating drink is essential to continued health and efficiency.

Then he goes on with the framework of his order, in which he seeks to suppress the sale of intoxicating drinks.

I will next read from Major-General Shafter:

> I have always been strongly opposed to the canteen system or the sale of intoxicating drinks of any kind on military reservations, and have opposed it until absolutely overruled and required to establish a canteen at my post. I regard it demoralizing to the men, besides impairing seriously their efficiency. The plea that it furnishes a large sum, which it does, to improve the table fare of the men, is, in my opinion, a very poor one, as the Government of the United States is perfectly able to feed its men without any assistance from the profits of rum selling. I have absolutely prohibited the sale of liquor or the opening of saloons in the city of Santiago, and have refused permission for cargoes of beer to come from the States here.

I next read a few words from Adjutant-General Corbin, an officer who has the respect and confidence of all who know him. He says:

> A cause of restlessness [in the Army] is traced to the excesses of the exchange, the saloon feature of which is not productive of good and should be done away with without further experiment. The sale of beer, superintended by a commissioned officer and served by noncommissioned officers and soldiers, is not conducive to discipline, nor is it a picture that can be submitted to the people for their approval.

Major-General WHEELER, still one of our own members, says:

> I am a thorough believer in temperance in all things, and am utterly opposed to soldiers being sold intoxicating liquors, and I believe that every effort should be exercised to remove the temptation of such dissipation from them.

Brig. Gen. William B. Rochester uses this language:

> There is no doubt that the drink habit works very great injury to the Army. It has been shown over and over again that those who endure the greatest fatigue and exposure are the men who do not drink.

General Willcox (retired) says:

> It is my opinion that the public good, as well as personal character of those concerned, would be enhanced very much by the exclusion of liquor from the rank and file of the Army, except under due medical prescription.

Mr. Chairman, "except under due medical prescription" defines the proper limitation to be placed upon the use of alcoholic drinks not only in the Army, but out of the Army.

No one will deny the baneful effects of an excessive use of liquor. No one will deny, either, that when it is of easy access indulgence is likely to follow.

If intoxicants are not on sale in the camp, soldiers will not be as likely to drink as if they are, and on the testimony of these general officers they are better off and the service is better off without rum.

Mr. GAINES. Does the gentleman propose to cut off these canteens, to deprive the soldiers of a little whisky on the battlefield, so useful at times?

Mr. GROUT. No, not if the whisky is prescribed by a physician. If the soldier is in a condition to require it, the physician will prescribe it; and without such a prescription I think it is unsafe for a soldier or anyone else to prescribe for himself. A man is always likely to be willing to prescribe for himself when he thinks he requires whisky; but it is a dangerous practice. Why not treat this poison as we do other poisons? Chemistry tells us that alcohol is a poison springing from vegetable death. Observation and experience tell us the same thing. Enough of it will kill a man. Then why not let the physician deal it out to us as he does other poisons? Especially is this necessary in the Army, where the restraint of home and friends is all withdrawn and but little is left to help the soldier to stand up against temptation. Leave it under control of the Medical Department, where it will be left if this amendment prevails, and stop the indiscriminate sale of intoxicating liquors in camp, and who doubts but that it would be better for the men morally and physically and would make better soldiers of them? Such, at least, is the testimony of the general officers from whom I have just read.

Mr. Chairman, I will not longer detain the House. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

[Mr. LEWIS of Washington addressed the committee. See Appendix.]

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is exhausted, and the question is on agreeing to the amendment of the gentleman from North Dakota.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

[Applause.]

Insert as section 16 the following:

"SEC. 16. That the Record and Pension Office of the War Department shall consist of a chief, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a brigadier-general, and an assistant chief, who shall have the rank, pay, and allowances of a lieutenant-colonel."

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, only a few days ago the distinguished gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] undertook to justify the payment of $20,000,000 by this country to the Kingdom of Spain for the relinquishment of its claim upon the Philippine Islands; and I must confess that I was grievously disappointed in the lameness and weakness of his explanation of that clause in the Paris treaty.

I have always enjoyed the exhibition of his talent on this floor. The fertility of his resources, as well as the boldness and audacity of his rejoinders, has often afforded fine entertainment for the members of the House. In fact, sir, the nerve which he has displayed, rather more than the logic of his arguments or justness of his conclusions, has been the wonder and the admiration of all those who have witnessed the agility of his performances without regard to their consistency.

But, sir, notwithstanding that gentleman's readiness in retort and his ample equipment for parliamentary debate, I was astonished to find that he could make no better answer to the gentleman from Arkansas [Mr. TERRY], who asked him why the Administration proposed to pay Spain $20,000,000 for ceding to this country the territory of the Philippine Islands, from which they had already been driven by force of arms. It seems to me, sir, that for the time being he must have relapsed into a condition of childlike simplicity when he answered by asking the gentleman from Arkansas another question, namely, as to why we paid Mexico $15,000,000 for relinquishing her claim upon territory which we had conquered in 1847–48. This, sir, is nothing better than a schoolboy's answer that he did wrong because he thought another boy had done wrong.

Allow me to suggest to the veteran statesman from Ohio that a well-read schoolboy might have helped him out with a better answer, and that even his supplementary explanation that this great Government, in a moment of triumph and great magnanimity, had generously granted to the conquered nation an allowance of $20,000,000 to heal the wounds which it had inflicted upon a conquered foe, comes with rather bad grace from one who has repeatedly on this floor charged his opponents with lending aid and comfort to the enemy, and who has recently in this same speech intimated that the opponents of his pet measure were lending encouragement to the enemy of the United States in opposing the ratification of that treaty; and it comes, too, with but little comfort to the oppressed taxpayer of this country to tell him that for purposes of "humanity and generosity" he must contribute the sum of $20,000,000 to pay the Spaniards for acknowledging that they have been ingloriously defeated in battle and ignominiously driven from the Western Hemisphere and had to abandon their possessions in the Orient.

Aye, sir, a well-read schoolboy might have given a much more plausible explanation; and if the gentleman will allow me the suggestion, I give it to him now, without any extra charge, and authorize him hereafter, when hard pressed in debate, to make use of this more simple and common-sense explanation of that proposed payment of $20,000,000, as well as the historical $15,000,000 that was paid to Mexico. It is this: The accidents or the achievements of war had delivered to us present and actual possession of these foreign possessions, and it needed no purchase to settle the right of title which had been determined by the power of the sword.

But so long as this was our only title, according to the law of nations, it would be subject to revision by a renewal of the conflict and repeated appeals to force, which would continuously subject the territory to the necessity of military defense of our title; but that the payment of the stipulated price, in consideration of which the foreign government forever relinquishes its right, title, and interest in the conquered territory, would forever bar that government from reasserting its claim.

In other words, we paid Mexico $15,000,000 for a perpetual quitclaim title; and if that was a cheaper method than continuing to hold it by military force, and if the territory thus acquired was sufficiently desirable to warrant that expenditure, it was certainly a good investment, as subsequent events have proven to be the case in that instance, and that, further, the Paris treaty now proposes to reimburse Spain to the extent of $20,000,000, in consideration of which Spain agrees to withdraw from the islands and never again to assert her sovereignty over them, or, in short, to give us a perpetual quitclaim title.

The truth of the business is that all of this talk about "magnanimity and generosity" amounts to nothing. It is a business proposition, cold-blooded and clear. If Spain's quitclaim title will make it cheaper for us to hold the islands by that method than to continually hold them by military power, and if the islands are worth holding at that price, the position is justifiable now, not because we once paid some other government $15,000,000 to conclude a treaty of peace, after we had whipped them, but because, in international law, a title thus secured gives us a proper standing in any international court of the world. The justification for the payment of this $20,000,000 must rest, not upon grounds of humanity, magnanimity, or generosity—all high-toned advertisements of hypocrisy—but upon the plain business question: Will it be worth $20,000,000 to us to have permanent and peaceable possession of Spain's title to the Philippine Islands?

Upon this ground, and no other, I suggest to the gentleman from Ohio he must rest his case. If he can prove to the people of this country that the payment of $20,000,000 for the Spanish title to the Philippine Islands will be a profitable investment, then he can rest assured that no sentimental sympathy for old Spain's poverty will be necessary, no vainglorious assertions of magnanimity will be necessary, and no hypocritical announcements of generosity will be expected. Let him answer this question in the full light of facts, already repeated to this House and the country: Will it be a profitable investment for this country to pay $20,000,000 to acquire the title to a territory so uninhabitable by white men that no citizen of this country will wish to occupy it as a free gift; a territory whose climate, whose soil, whose physical conditions are all so inhospitable that an American citizen would feel toward it as one is said to have felt toward a certain other portion of the world, when he said that if he owned that State and hades both, he would rent it out and live in hades?

But does the gentleman rest the case on the other ground, that our trade and commerce with these islands will be so advantageous and profitable to us that it will justify us in paying the vast sum of $20,000,000 for a peaceable and permanent title? If so, then I wish to remind him that the last report of the world's commerce informs us that the entire foreign trade of these islands during the past year was less than $12,000,000, and that of that amount less than one-half of a million came to the United States. Why, sir, they are so far away and so much nearer our commercial competitors that even the supplies for our Army now occupying the islands have to be bought from Australia instead of from our own agricultural producers. And by the very terms of the treaty Spain, 3,000 miles nearer to them than we are, is still to have equal commercial privileges with our own people.

No, sir. It seems to me to be a bad bargain at any price. So far from paying $20,000,000 for those islands, which means about $2 per head for the negroes and Malays now occupying them, it seems to me that they would be dear property at 20 cents a head. In fact, if we owned them, I think it would be a good investment to pay somebody 20 cents a head to take them off our hands. [Applause.] Suppose, sir, that the entire trade of the islands, the entire $12,000,000, should come to the United States, we are to pay $20,000,000 for the title; and then you ask us to enlarge the standing Army of the United States to a hundred thousand men, which means about $150,000,000 a year of additional expense to the taxpayers of this country, when the only possible excuse you can make is that we need these soldiers to govern and control the turbulent population of these islands.

Now, figure it out and see where the profit comes in. Say nothing of the investment of $20,000,000, but consider only this additional expense of $150,000,000 for the standing Army, with an increased export trade of half a million a year, and where would our profits come in? It seems to me they will have to be calculated like Henry Ward Beecher is said to have calculated his profits on hogs. Having paid $2 apiece for the pigs, he fed them $10 worth of corn, and then sold the pigs for $7 a head, and when felicitating himself on the profit he had made in the pig market one of his neighbors twitted him on his speculation, and he replied: "Oh! my friend, you don't——"

[Great laughter.]

Mr. VANDIVER. I ask two or three minutes more. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that he may be allowed to proceed for three minutes. Is there objection?

Mr. GIBSON and others. I object.

A MEMBER. What became of the pig? [Laughter.]

Mr. VANDIVER. I would like to know who made the objection.

The CHAIRMAN. All gentlemen will be seated. Business will be suspended until the committee is in order, and gentlemen will take their seats and cease conversation.

Mr. VANDIVER. Mr. Chairman, a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. VANDIVER. Am I to have the privilege of putting that pig in the RECORD? [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana rose.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Indiana [Mr. JOHNSON].

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Mr. Chairman, I only intend to occupy the floor for a moment, simply that I may pave the way to extend my remarks in the RECORD to cover certain phases of the Philippine question which I have heretofore omitted to discuss fully. Nor do I rise, Mr. Chairman, at this late hour in the debate for the purpose of answering the personal attacks that have from time to time been made upon me in this body since the discussion commenced. I knew when I first determined to give expression to my convictions on the pending bill that it would necessarily awaken some antagonism on this side of the Chamber, and I early resolved that I would not permit myself to be dragged into any personal controversy if I could possibly avoid it.

How well I have succeeded in keeping my resolution I leave to the judgment of the House. I have no recollection of having broken silence to reply to a single one of the personal remarks directed at me except on one occasion, and that was last night when the gentleman from Indiana [Mr. LANDIS] made an unexpected and unwarranted attack upon me. I think the Chair will bear me out that even then I did not permit myself to be betrayed into any intemperance of language, but simply confined myself to a plain statement of facts in my own defense.

Mr. Chairman, if my motives have been bad in the position I have taken, if the position I have assumed has itself been unpatriotic or against the true interests of the people, they will have no trouble in discovering that fact. It was not necessary that any gentleman should impugn my motive or accuse me of being cowardly or unpatriotic, or of making an unjustifiable assault upon the President, or of having abandoned my party in order to call popular attention to it. If, upon the other hand, my motives have been honest, and the position which I have taken has been in the true interests of my countrymen, no epithets which can be applied to me will in any wise harm me, either with my own constituents or with the people of this Republic generally.

I have tried to address myself, sir, not so much to the passion and prejudice of the hour as I have to what I conceive to be right, and it is to that cool and sober second thought of the country which is sure to follow this hour of excitement and heated controversy that I make my appeal, confident that it will result in my vindication and even in my approval.

I was a Republican, sir, when this debate commenced, and I am a Republican now. I have not deserted my party, nor do I have any expectation of doing so. I have not hesitated, however, to freely criticise the action of the President, notwithstanding he is a distinguished member of my party. I have done this because I believed his policy to be wrong and fraught with great danger to ourselves and our posterity.

Had I remained silent under such convictions I would have been recreant to my duty as I understand it. I have supported the Chief Executive on the floor on previous occasions and been condemned severely here for doing it. I stand ready to support him again whenever I hear him criticised unjustly, no difference what may be the consequence to myself. If ever I get ready to leave my party—and, as I have already said, I do not anticipate doing so, for I believe in the cardinal principles upon which it is founded, and for this very reason have resisted a policy which I believed to be antagonistic to those principles—I will endeavor to go of my own accord and in an orderly manner. I certainly do not care to be kicked out of the party tabernacle by gentlemen who, I am sure, do not appreciate my motives, nor to have my luggage thrown unceremoniously out of the windows.

But I have perhaps said enough, sir, upon subjects purely personal, and I now desire to invite the attention of the House to consider the effect which the President's policy of Philippine annexation will have with respect to the great labor and agricultural elements of our population if it is accepted by the American people.

Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States has always been a leading protectionist. He has advocated protection in season and out of season, in Congress and on the hustings. No man now living has been more conspicuously identified with this economic principle than he. He has insisted that it was beneficial for all classes of our people—manufacturers, farmers, and laboring men. He has over and over again dwelt on its advantages to the agriculturist, and insisted that it was the laboring man's greatest bulwark, essential to his happiness and comfort, and protecting him from competition with pauper labor in other climes.

Mr. Chairman, has the President changed his mind on the subject? Has he abandoned the farmer and the laborer? Is he now willing to deny them protection and inflict upon them unrestrained competition with cheap labor from abroad? I confess, sir, that the indications seem to me to point this way. Let us examine the subject for a little while. The annexation of Hawaii was a favorite measure with the President. He negotiated and sent to the Senate a treaty of annexation. The ratification of this treaty was earnestly opposed in the Senate, in the House, and in the country by men who believed that a union with Hawaii would be to the great injury of the country, particularly to the agricultural and laboring elements. But the President threw his powerful influence in favor of ratification. He even sent for the Senators who opposed it and labored earnestly with them to abandon their opposition. When it became apparent that the necessary two-thirds vote could not be obtained for the treaty in the Senate, he insisted that the annexation should be effected by a joint resolution of Congress, and this course having been taken, the union with the Sandwich Islands became an accomplished fact.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the President well knew when he did all this that one of the great products of Hawaii was sugar. He knew, too, that it was produced there by cheap native labor; that our own laborers could not go there and live, and even if they could, that it was not possible for them to work for the wages paid there. He knew, too, that there cheap native laborers were employed and controlled by the great capitalists. For some years we had been admitting this Hawaiian sugar free into this country in consideration of certain treaty rights accorded to us by the Hawaiian Government. But the President well knew also that this treaty could be abrogated in the near future and this product of Hawaiian cheap labor be put upon our dutiable list. With all this knowledge, however, the President urged upon us political union with Hawaii, and thereby made it impossible for us ever to impose a duty upon her sugar, which, under our Federal Constitution, must now forever continue to come into our country entirely free of duty.

Let us, Mr. Chairman, examine the matter a little further. Let us see where the policy of the President is tending, even if he is unaware of it. The Chief Executive knows quite well that the annexation of Cuba is on the programme of those who are powerful in this country to influence political action. He is well aware that we have for years coveted this island because of its rich soil, natural resources, and proximity to our country. It can not possibly have reached his notice that many leading men in public life and in business and commercial circles are openly declaring that Cuba should be annexed. It is true that the President himself declared, when the Spanish war commenced, that it was not to be waged for forcible annexation, and that this by our code of morals would be "criminal aggression." It is also true that Congress proclaimed a war solely for the emancipation of Cuba and disavowed any intention to permanently govern her.

Doubtless many persons, Mr. Chairman, were perfectly sincere when these declarations were made. But there were some who were not so, and who then desired and designed that the war should finally result in Cuba becoming a part of the United States. Many of those who proclaimed for the permanent independence of Cuba, too, have of late changed their opinions and now favor its annexation. It is idle, sir, to deny this. I state only that which is matter of common observation. There are commercial interests in this country that demand annexation, and they will endeavor to have their way. Can we rely upon the President, Mr. Chairman, to defeat this? Is he the kind of a man who will stand against it resolutely when the occasion arises and insist on keeping the national pledge that Cuba shall be free and independent? I fear not, sir. The only element which will demand annexation is the one to which the President is largely indebted for his promotion to power. If the island is not taken by open violence, if only some plausible excuse for annexing it is shown, if it be specially claimed that the Cubans are incapable of self-government, and that it is a high duty we owe to civilization to annex it to our domain, I greatly fear that the President will not stand out against the movement, even if the Cuban people are themselves mostly against it.

But be this as it may, sir, the President knows that Cuba will at an early day probably be annexed, and that when it is, her products, including sugar and tobacco, upon which we have heretofore been able to impose a tariff, will ever afterwards enter our ports free of duty, to the damage of our agricultural and laboring classes.

Yet, Mr. Chairman, notwithstanding all I have stated, the President seeks to continue the policy of acquiring foreign territory, of extending our possessions to islands which, when acquired, will have to be annexed to our domain, and which produce by cheap, tropical labor the very products which are produced upon American farms and by American laborers, products which we have heretofore protected our farmers and laborers from by tariff duties, but which must come in entirely free under our Constitution when annexation once occurs.

Mr. Chairman, am I not right in this? Do I do the President injustice by this statement? Let us see, sir. When the hostilities with Spain ceased, it was not only the right but the duty of the President, under the treaty-making power conferred by the Constitution upon him and the United States Senate, to take the initiative in concluding a treaty of peace. It was for him to negotiate such a treaty and for the Senate to confirm or reject it. Sir, it was in the performance of this duty that the President made his great mistake. He was authorized to name, in the first instance, what should be the terms of this treaty. He could put into the instrument whatever stipulations he desired and omit whatever stipulations he pleased, acting always within his constitutional power and obtaining, of course, the assent of Spain to the stipulations he inserted.

Did he not well know at the time that the ceding and annexation to this country of Porto Rico and of the Philippines would be an immense injury to the American farmer and laborer? That annexation of these islands would, under the Constitution, make impossible a tariff against their sugar, tobacco, hemp, and other products raised by cheap tropical labor, and which had theretofore had to pay tariff under our laws? Undoubtedly, sir, he did. We certainly did not need Porto Rico. In the Philippines a coaling station would have answered all our needs. Indeed, sir, it is charged, and generally believed to be true—has never been authoritatively denied—that the President originally designed only to exact from Spain a coaling station in the Philippines, but that he became impressed on his Western trip with the idea that it would be popular to acquire the islands themselves, and therefore yielded to the importunities of bad advisers, and instructed and permitted our peace commissioners at Paris, who simply were his instruments and obliged to obey his instructions, to demand and procure from Spain the cession of the whole of the Philippines and also the island of Porto Rico. Ah, Mr. Chairman, the President of the United States could have saved us all of the troublesome questions by which we are now perplexed if he had only been wise and firm at this juncture; if he had simply provided in the treaty of peace for the evacuation of Cuba, and a coaling station in the Philippines. The great masses of our people would have been satisfied with this. They were demanding nothing more. Only the selfish and grasping commercial interests which expected to profit by it were insisting upon Philippine annexation. No difference who advised him to the contrary, he should not have yielded to the advice and consented to depart from all of our traditions.

The President of the United States is alone to blame for the unwise terms of this treaty. When the treaty of peace was signed, the Philippine republic was fully established and amply able to resist all efforts which Spain might make to overthrow it. Had he even insisted in the treaty, as he did with respect to Cuba, that Spain should evacuate the Philippines and leave the islanders in possession to govern themselves, our people would have approved of his policy. Why did not the President think of the effect of Philippine annexation upon the American farmer when he negotiated this treaty? Why did he forget the laboring class of the United States at this critical time? What were the influences that induced him to negotiate for the cession of this territory which we did not need?

And now, sir, largely as a result of the President's action and influence, what do we find? What will certainly be our condition in a few years at the very farthest, unless the American people at once intervene? The hemp, sugar, tobacco, and other products of Hawaii, Cuba, Porto Rico, and the Philippines, raised by cheap labor under the management of the great capitalists and wealthy combines, will pour into our ports, duty free, in competition with the American farmer and laborer.

Mr. Chairman, what will be the consequence of this? Upon this point I need not dilate. Every gentleman who hears me knows that it will work immense damage to the producers of sugar from either cane or beets, to the growers of hemp, and of tobacco, and of all other competing products, and to those who labor in those industries. And where is the compensation to the American farmer and laborer for this great loss, sir? What advantage will the possession of these islands be to them? Absolutely none whatever. They can not either live or work there. The labor can be performed only by the natives.

No Americans will make money there, except the possessors of great wealth, who will reap enormous gains from the profits which they will realize from the sale of these products in the free markets of the United States. Not one dollar of these profits will go into the hands of our farmers and laborers to reimburse them for the damage to their business. Upon the other hand, they, in common with all of our people, will have to bear the burden of a heavy increase in taxation for the support of the Army and Navy of the country, which must be greatly enlarged in order to protect and defend these islands and the great corporations who are doing business there.

Mr. Chairman, does not the President foresee this condition? Did he not foresee it when he insisted upon annexing Hawaii and providing for the cession of Porto Rico and the Philippines in the Paris treaty of peace? If he did not, he certainly ought to have done so. Let us not forget, either, that the President has agreed in this treaty to pay out of the Treasury of the United States the tremendous sum of $20,000,000 to Spain for the opportunity of putting this ruinous policy which I have described into practice, and that the farmers and laborers of this nation must submit to taxation for the payment of this sum. But the President has not even stopped with this, sir. He has absolutely destroyed all prospect of our manufacturers, farmers, and laborers selling any of their products in the Philippines, by giving to Great Britain, Germany, France, Austria, Australia, and other foreign countries the "open door" in the Philippines.

In other words, he has agreed to have no tariff duties there imposed upon the imports of foreign nations into the islands, and to make no discrimination in tariff rates in favor of the manufacturers, farmers, and producers of our own country. While Spain held the Philippines, sir, she gave all foreign nations the same rates of tariff duties—put each foreign nation upon exactly the same footing. The consequence was that England, France, Germany, and Australia sold to the Philippines their merchandise and products, while we sold them practically nothing. This was because of the advantage in location and freight rates which these countries possessed over the United States. Under the open-door policy of the President in the Philippines—owing to his establishing the open-door policy—these advantages will still exist in their favor, and hence, while suffering from competition with the Philippine products, which are brought here free, the American farmer and laborer and manufacturer will be able to sell nothing in the Philippines, as they might have done had the tariff there been framed so as to discriminate in their favor.

Mr. Chairman, do you wonder that I inquire whether the President has changed his mind on the tariff and concluded to abandon the American farmer and laborer? Sir, had William J. Bryan been elected President of the United States, and formulated and endeavored to carry into effect such a policy as this, would there have been a Republican in the land who would not have denounced it in language of indignant remonstrance? Certainly not. Why, then, should we as Republicans fail to protest with the President against his unwise policy? Are the interests of the country not to be carefully guarded and protected? Is not the defeat of the Paris treaty in the Senate and the failure of the President's whole policy of annexation a thing to be greatly desired by those of us who, as Republicans, believe in protection and desire to preserve it?

It will not do, Mr. Chairman, to claim that the President has no policy in the Philippines; that he is only holding them as the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy pending such disposition as Congress may see fit to make of them. The President, as I have shown, has a Philippine policy. He has outlined it in the treaty which he negotiated and which he sent to the Senate and which he is now urging his supporters in the Senate to ratify. That treaty provides, as I have said, for the absolute cession to the United States of these islands. When that treaty was signed, the Philippine republic was a thoroughly organized government and had possession of all of the Philippine soil except the city of Iloilo, which they were then besieging and which subsequently passed into their hands, and the city of Manila, which was occupied by our own Army by their cooperation. Spain had lost her possession and control and was incapable of recovering them.

The Philippine republic was entitled to its recognition as an independent nation, having wrested its territory from Spain. And yet the President took from Spain an absolute cession of these islands, which she had lost, and, after having sent the treaty to the Senate for confirmation, issued to the Philippines a proclamation. This proclamation the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] incorporated in his speech, delivered on this floor a few days ago. If gentlemen will examine it, they will see that in it the President declared to the Filipinos that the victory of our Navy and the surrender of the islands by Spain had suspended Spanish sovereignty in the islands; that her sovereignty had become ours; that the government and control of the islands now belonged to the United States, to whose military government their taxes and dues should thereafter be paid.

The President, it is true, declared in this proclamation that our advent was to protect the Filipinos and bless them with good government, but he also blandly informed them that, while they would be protected if they submitted, they would be coerced if they refused to submit to our authority, and went on to state to them that our mission among them was one of "beneficent assimilation." What more conclusive proof, sir, that the President has a policy and that it is one of forcible coercion of the people of the Philippines than this proclamation affords? Is it not as plain as day that the President is now attempting to graft this policy upon our body politic by inducing the Senate of the United States to accept and ratify it as set forth in the treaty? What, then, do gentlemen mean by talking about the President simply holding the Philippines under the war powers and of his having no policy concerning their future? Ah, sir, it is, I say again, this very policy of the President, so unnecessarily and unwisely adopted, which has brought upon us so much anxiety and difficulty. Can not the President withdraw this treaty from the consideration of the Senate and negotiate a new one? If not, will not the Senate decline to ratify it, and in this way induce the making of a new treaty?

Mr. Chairman, if the people only see the danger in time and insist upon this, we may yet be saved. Heaven grant that they may do so before they are irretrievably committed to a policy which not only assails our great agricultural and laboring classes, by exposing them to competition with cheap labor from the Tropics, but which also menaces the peace and happiness of all classes of our countrymen.

I shall incorporate into the RECORD, sir, with my remarks, the letter of the representative of the Philippine republic now in this country, recently addressed to our Department of State, for the benefit of those who care to be informed as to the position assumed by him as to the rights of his government.

APPENDIX.

Memorandum relative to the right of the Philippine republic to recognition.

[Accompanying letter to the honorable the Secretary of State of date January 11, 1899.]

For almost the entire past one hundred years the natives of the Philippine Islands have striven quite incessantly, by organization and force of arms, to throw off an alien and oppressive yoke. Without reviewing at length the reasons which have induced them to take this course, it may be sufficient to say that ever since the seizure of the Philippine Islands by the Spanish Government, more than three hundred years ago, the natives have been deprived of all right of local self-government, in the face of the "blood treaty" of 1565, granting the Philippines autonomous government, and the liberties guaranteed by the constitution of Cadiz in 1814, and have been denied the privilege of levying and collecting their own taxes or taking any part in the direction of the proceeds of taxation, and have been controlled by governors not in sympathy with them, but, without prior acquaintance, sent to them from a nation foreign in thought to themselves. Unlike even the island of Cuba, they have been denied any shadow of participation in the affairs of government through having a membership in the Spanish Cortes.

In the struggle upon which the Filipinos have been engaged for, as I have said, nearly a hundred years, they have been largely influenced and controlled in their hopes, aspirations, and actions by the Declaration of Independence of the American people, particularly in so far as that document has declared that "all men are created equal; that they are endowed by their Creator with certain inalienable rights; that among these are life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." They have further learned from the same document, in their studies of American law and liberty, that "to secure these rights governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed." They understand from it that colonial government is, as the Declaration of Independence says, "destructive of these ends," and that it is therefore the right of the people to "alter or abolish it, and to institute new government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness."

Further studying that instrument, they have found that it indicted the King of England for keeping among the Americans "in time of peace, standing armies, without the consent of (their) legislatures," and because he had "affected to render the military independent of, and superior to, the civil power." They have, therefore, also learned to be jealous of armies of any nationality, the presence of which might curtail their civil liberties, without their consent.

Finding themselves, therefore, subject to all the grievances as to government without representation, unjust taxation, quartering of military among them, subordination of civil to military power, they rose repeatedly in rebellion, and finally on the 18th of June last, being in possession at that time of the larger share of the Philippine Islands, the Spanish Government being recognized even then over a comparatively small area, they formed an independent government. In the formation of this government and the drafting of its constitution they provided for and insured to the independent people of the Philippine Islands the ends contemplated by the Constitution of the United States, establishing justice, insuring domestic tranquillity, providing for the common defense, promoting the general welfare, and securing the blessings of liberty to them and their posterity.

At the time of the formation of this constitution, parallel as it was practically, in connection with their revolution, to the time of the adoption of the American Declaration of Independence, they found themselves superior in position as to their control over their country to that of the Americans when the Declaration of Independence was framed; for the Spaniards possessed only a small portion of the islands, while the Filipinos were in control of nearly all of their large cities, as well as of the country beyond.

Acting under this constitution, they have carried out all of its injunctions, establishing justice, raising armies, maintaining a post-office system, and exercising the further legitimate functions of a government. Their position at the present time is better, I respectfully suggest, so far as general recognition of their national authority is concerned, than was that of the American Republic prior to the ratification of a treaty between America and England; for, as you will recall, British armies were in possession of American ports when the treaty of peace was signed, whereas now the Spanish Government is recognized nowhere in the Philippiae Islands, except part of the island of Mindanao; the Philippine government reigning supreme everywhere, save at the city of Manila and the town of Cavite adjoining it.

The mere fact that Manila is an important port does not, as we are told, affect the jurisdiction of the republic over the islands and the right of the republic to recognition, for, as was said by Mr. Cass, Secretary of State, to Mr. McLane in 1859 to sustain the recognition by the United States of a Mexican government after civil war, it is not necessary that such government should be in possession of the City of Mexico. It is enough if it be "obeyed by a large majority of the country and is likely to continue."

May I further respectfully submit to you, in view of the foregoing, that the Philippine republic, established as it was, exercising the functions it exercises, controlling the territory it has jurisdiction over, has come within the severest definition of the word "nation!" For, says Phillimore's International Law: "A nation is a people permanently occupying a definite territory, having a common government peculiar to themselves for the administration of justice and the preservation of internal order, and capable of maintaining relations with all other governments," while Kent in his Commentaries says that "Cicero and after him Grotius defines a regular enemy to be a power which hath the elements or constituents of a nation, such as a government, a code of laws, a national treasury, consent and agreement of the citizens, and which pays a regard to treaties of peace and alliance."

Permit me further to respectfully suggest to you that, pursuant to American doctrines with which you are more familiar than the writer can possibly be, there has been no moment of time when the United States could have acquired any title to the Philippine Islands, save by the express consent of their inhabitants, and that, such consent not having been given, and Spain having, as it must be confessed, no practical jurisdiction or control over the Philippine Islands since June 18, 1898, she is without power to pass title to any other nation.

If it be true that at all times since the date named the Philippine republic has been entitled to recognition as a separate national entity, then it must be that ever since such time it has in fact been in strictness a national entity; the recognition being merely the evidence of an existing state of facts and not in itself creating a nation.

I therefore venture to invite your attention, as I do most respectfully, to the precedents established by preceding American Secretaries of State, and in so doing apologize for referring to a subject with which of necessity you are more familiar than the representative of the Philippine Islands can hope to be.

Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, in addressing President Monroe in 1816, said: "There is a stage in such revolutionary contests when the parties struggling for independence have, I conceive, a right to demand its acknowledgment of neutral parties, and when the acknowledgment may be granted without departure from the obligations of neutrality. It is a stage when the independence is established as a matter of fact, so as to leave the chances of the opposing party to recover its dominion utterly desperate."

May I submit to you for your consideration the fact that Spanish recovery of the Philippine Islands has been an utter impossibility at any time since the promulgation of the constitution of the Philippine Republic, and therefore, within the very language of Mr. Adams, the Philippine Republic has for nearly seven months last past been an independent government, and as such entitled to recognition?

At a later period Mr. Adams, Secretary of State, in writing Mr. Anderson, said that "when a sovereign has a reasonable hope of maintaining his authority over insurgents, the acknowledgment of the independence of such insurgents would be an international wrong. It is otherwise when such sovereign is manifestly disabled from maintaining the contest." In the present case the disability was complete. Spain was, when our independence was declared, at war with another nation many times her superior, and has been for months practically ousted from her possession of the Philippine Islands, save one city (Iloilo), which she has now lost.

There having been for nearly seven months but one de facto government prevailing in the Philippine Islands, I further respectfully submit to you the fact that the character of such government, as a de facto government, even if it were not more, does not affect unfavorably the question of its recognition; for, as was stated by Mr. Livingston, Secretary of State, to Sir Charles Vaughan in 1833:

"It has been the principle and the invariable practice of the United States to recognize that as the legal government of another nation which, by its establishment in the actual exercise of political power, might be supposed to have received the express or implied assent of the people."

It was further said by Mr. Buchanan, Secretary of State, in 1848: "In its intercourse with foreign nations the Government of the United States has, from its origin, always recognized de facto governments. We recognize the right of all nations to create and re-form their political institutions according to their own will and pleasure. * * * It is sufficient for us to know that a government exists, capable of maintaining itself, and then its recognition on our part inevitably follows."

That the government of the Philippine republic is amply able to maintain itself has received a practical demonstration.

Nor is it in any wise important that Spain herself has up to the present time failed to recognize the Philippine government, for, as was said by Mr. Webster, Secretary of State, in writing Mr. Hulsemann in December, 1850:

"It is not to be required of neutral powers that they should await the recognition of a new government by a parent state."

It is to be borne in mind that beyond the limits controlled by American armies in Manila, there is no government existing offering any opposition to that of the Philippine republic or in any manner questioning its authority or its right to control the future of the islands.

I refrain from adding more to the long list of similar citations that can be made, but can not pass over without remark a sentence in a letter from Mr. Clay, Secretary of State, to Mr. Middleton in 1825:

"An attempt of the British Parliament to tax without their consent the former British colonies, now these United States, produced the war of our Revolution and led to the establishment of that independence and freedom which we now so highly prize. Moderation and forbearance on the part of Great Britain might have postponed, but could not have prevented our ultimate separation."

If, therefore, the Americans were justified, as undoubtedly they were, in throwing off a foreign yoke for the reason indicated by Mr. Clay, how much more justified were the Filipinos. Their taxation was excessive, it was levied without representation, their services were enforced without compensation, and the relations between themselves and the Government levying the tax, unlike the relations between America and England, were those of distinct peoples, not descendent one from the other, but influenced by different religions and of a different race and civilization.

Is it, therefore, to be supposed that with all these existing differences, alien government, no matter what nation might be the governor, would be more acceptable to the Filipinos than was the government of Great Britain to the Americans?

May I further call your attention to the fact that, although a treaty of peace has been signed between the United States and the Kingdom of Spain, by the terms of which Spain ceded her sovereignty over the Philippine Islands to the United States, in fact Spain had no sovereignty whatever to cede?

As before recited, at the time of such signature an independent government, performing all its functions as a government and entitled to recognition as such by the strictest rules laid down by all the American Secretaries of State, was in possession of all of the islands except the port of Manila, controlled by the Americans, and the port of Iloilo, where the Spanish were besieged; the possession of Manila by the Americans having been obtained by them through the joint action of the American and Philippine armies, the Filipinos having prevented exit from the city on several sides while the Americans attacked on one side.

Spain was unable to deliver actual and peaceable possession of anything to the Americans, nor could she deliver the insignia of title to them in any shape whatever through any treaty of peace, all government buildings and archives having long before passed from her. All that Spain had to give was a claim, incapable of enforcement, save by larger armies and navies than Spain had at her control, and all, therefore, that Spain did give to America, was the naked opportunity to overwhelm the Filipinos, if possible, and establish a form of foreign rule, a thing against which they struggled for a hundred years and had at last succeeded in throwing off.

Of course, if, as before stated, Spain could cede to the United States nothing but an empty and exploded claim, it follows that a ratification of a treaty of peace could confer no greater right upon the United States than its signing; for if the right to own the Philippine Islands and people was incapable of transfer from Spain to the United States, the ratification of a treaty could not give life to such dead claim.

Recognizing, as the Americans have, in their Declaration of Independence, in their Constitution, and in their history of more than one hundred years, the absolute right of all nations to rule themselves, free from the control of alien masters, I submit to you, with entire confidence, the right of the Filipinos to their self-government.

Summarizing the foregoing, permit me to say:

1. American precept and example have influenced my people to desire independent government.

2. Suffering, as did the Americans, from alien rule, they rose and drove out foreign masters.

3. They established, and for seven months have maintained, a form of government resembling the American in that it is based upon the right of the people to rule.

4. This government has, according to doctrines laid down by distinguished American Secretaries of State, become entitled to recognition by the American Republic.

5. The expelled government of Spain having, at the time of the signing of the treaty of peace, possession of only one port, and the remainder of the Philippines, except Manila, being in the possession of the Philippine Republic, and all insignia of sovereignty having passed from Spain, that country could give no title to the United States for the Philippine Islands.

6. Spain having no title to give, her claim can not be rendered better by the ratification of the treaty of peace.

7. From the foregoing it would seem to follow that the present recognition of the first republic of Asia by the greatest Republic of America would be consonant with right, justice, and precedent.

I can not close this memorandum without taking occasion to assure you of the gratitude felt by my countrymen toward the Americans for the assistance rendered them in the attainment of their liberty, and of their strong desire, in every way less than their effacement as a nation, to give practical expression to this gratitude, and further to hope that as self-respecting nations the bonds of friendship between the two may grow stronger with the passage of years.

FELIPE AGONCILLO.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section be now closed.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish the gentleman from Iowa would yield to me for one moment.

Mr. HULL. It will come just as well on the next section, will it not?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Yes, I think so.

The motion of Mr. HULL was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer my amendment to that section as an additional paragraph. I will say that it is the provision I gave notice that I would offer at the proper time, amended so that I think it ought to meet the approbation of gentlemen on the other side.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

That no part of the Army constituting the organization under this act shall be used for, or shall do the duty of, a posse comitatus, or be employed in putting down strikes or riots, or doing any police duty whatever, in any State in this Union, except upon application of the legislature, or the executive of such State (when the legislature can not be convened), in accordance with section 4, Article IV, of the Constitution of the United States.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I offer this as an additional section, in lieu of my former proposition.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I ask the gentleman from New York if he will yield to me for a minute?

Mr. CUMMINGS. I can not just now. I must say a word in reply to my friend from Massachusetts [Mr. WALKER]. I have been accused here of being a demagogue, of defending anarchy and tramps, and of disgracing my country on the floor here to-day for persisting in offering this amendment to the bill. The most dangerous feature of our Government, Mr. Chairman, is the encroachment of the Executive upon the rights of the people. Next to this, probably, in point of danger are the sneers of men who berate and misrepresent those who are trying to limit the Executive to his constitutional functions and privileges.

Mr. Chairman, I have been charged with arrogating to myself the representation on this floor of the labor organizations of the United States. I claim no such thing and have never made any such claim. I am a laborer myself and a citizen of the United States, and I simply claim the right to uphold local self-government, State rights—the Democratic doctrine of State rights as guaranteed by the Constitution of the United States—and nothing more. [Applause on the Democratic side.] I offer this amendment at this time because I foresee from the movement of the hands of the clock that I am going to be barred out, and not get an opportunity to offer it hereafter where I think it would be more fitting. I hope, Mr. Chairman, that we may have a vote on it now and settle it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise, Mr. Chairman, simply to call the attention of my friend from Missouri [Mr. VANDIVER] to an oversight of his in reference to the debate in which I participated on Friday last. The gentleman has stated that my only answer to the interrogatory put to me by the gentleman from Arkansas

[Mr. TERRY] was to ask him another question. Now, let us see what the RECORD shows upon that subject. Evidently my friend has overlooked it, or he would not have made that statement. On page 1093 of the RECORD, following the interrogatory of the gentleman from Arkansas, this is what I said:

Mr. GROSVENOR. There will be no evasion about it. We were in possession, constructively, of the Philippine Islands. We entered into a treaty stipulation which involved the turning over of certain public works, certain results of a recent expenditure of large sums of public money, and Spain lay crushed. The American people were proud and haughty, and they were generous and benevolent; and in the interest of appealing to the world that we were willing to deal justly, equitably, and generously with the Kingdom of Spain, they gave them $20,000,000.

Mr. VANDIVER. The gentleman will allow me to say, in justice to him, that I had intended to say that he had subsequently added that statement——

Mr. GROSVENOR. Oh, no; not subsequently. And I never amended the report.

Mr. VANDIVER. It was during the gentleman's speech.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I never changed one word or syllable of the report.

Mr. VANDIVER. The gentleman is correct. The statement he has just read was made during the same speech—a little afterwards.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Right at the time.

Mr. VANDIVER. I intended to add that the gentleman from Ohio had made that explanation; and then I desired to ask him whether he was putting the payment of the $20,000,000 on the ground of generosity or on the ground of business. I preferred, and I suppose he would prefer, to rest the justification on the business ground instead of the ground of generosity. I did not suppose he would consider it a matter of generosity.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The gentleman will allow me in my own time to say that my approval of that arrangement now, as always, is upon the ground that the treaty-making power of this country agreed to it through an instrumentality that I most highly respect, and whose statements in regard to it and the reasons for it have all been furnished in the printed report of the discussions upon the treaty by the Peace Commission. The grounds are stated there, and I very fully approve those grounds.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I rise to make a point of order upon the amendment of the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS], on the ground that the proposed limitation of the power of the President as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States is not germane to a bill proposing to reorganize the Army. But before making that point, I want to say a word as to the amendment itself.

I am a State rights man and for State rights under the Constitution. I understand the gentleman from New York to be no more, because when State rights were invoked against the Constitution, he went out and served, I believe, in the Army of the United States——

Mr. CUMMINGS. And with a Jersey regiment, too.

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. We know his patriotism. But I desire to point out to the gentleman and to the House that under this amendment the forces of the United States at that time could not have been used in putting down the insurrection against the laws of the United States. It was the power of the President as Commander in Chief, using the armed forces of the United States—Regulars and Volunteers—that enabled him to enforce the laws of the United States against governors and legislatures and all those who used the doctrine of State rights to oppose the Constitution and the laws, which are supreme.

No amendment that we can adopt here, in any general terms, can take away from the constitutional power of the President to enforce those laws. No amendment should undertake to take away from the constitutional discretion and power of the President in the enforcement of the laws—no matter whether people agree, as a matter of policy, as I do, that that power should not be invoked without the request of the governor, except in the last resort. I think that the responsibility for the preservation of order should be thrown upon the special community. I believe that it is better to let the community first feel what mob law means, and not to be too quick to use the military. I believe that it is better for the community to realize and for the country to realize how far and to what extremes they are going before the standing army is used, so that when it shall be used the sympathies of the people may be behind it, as they were after Abraham Lincoln had waited and waited until April, 1861, before he invoked the military power and until the first shot was fired upon Sumter and had united all loyal people.

As a matter of policy, I stand with the spirit of that amendment; but when it is proposed to include in an army bill a provision that the President shall not have full discretion to enforce the Constitution and the laws, I would cut my tongue off before I would vote for such an amendment; and I think the gentleman from New York, when he reflects on the matter, will feel in the same way.

Mr. CUMMINGS. There is nothing in my amendment which conflicts with the position of the gentleman from New Jersey.

Mr. HULL. I move that all debate on this amendment be now closed.

Mr. BAILEY. Before the motion of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] is submitted, I want to see whether we can reach an understanding about taking the vote. It is now clear that we shall not even get through the consideration of the bill by sections when the hour already fixed for taking the vote shall arrive. There are at least two gentlemen on the other side who desire to address the House, and several on this side, of whom I frankly say I am one. I wish to see whether we can not reach an agreement to fix the vote for 4 o'clock instead of 3.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair suggests that that can only be done in the House.

Mr. BAILEY. If an arrangement can be reached by unanimous consent, I will ask that the committee rise in order that such an order may be made by the House.

Mr. HULL. I wish to say, Mr. Chairman, that there is an amendment suggested to me by one of my colleagues from Iowa—an amendment which is not in the bill—which I think should be considered and which I believe will be adopted by the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I will agree, Mr. Chairman, that this amendment shall be offered and be considered as pending when the bill is reported to the House. There is no desire to cut off any amendment. The purpose of my request is merely to secure time for discussion.

Mr. HEPBURN. I have an amendment to the bill in the form of an additional section that I wish to offer——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that there is an amendment already pending for an additional section. Unless the amendment of the gentleman from Iowa is germane to the proposed additional section, the Chair thinks it would not be now in order.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is not germane to the pending section. It is, however, a proposition that I desire to offer to the House when the proper time comes.

Mr. BAILEY. This arrangement which I have suggested would not interfere, of course, with the right of the gentleman from Iowa. We could agree that at half past 2 o'clock general debate should begin and continue, say, for one hour and a half, and then a vote shall be taken upon the bill in the House.

Mr. DALZELL. I would like to ask the gentleman from Texas how much time he would ask on that side, if the time should be extended?

Mr. BAILEY. I think, Mr. Chairman, that it would be fair to divide it equally. I understand the gentleman from Pennsylvania himself and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HOPKINS] desire to speak on that side. I assume that one-half of the hour and a half would be given to this side of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest that by unanimous consent we go into the House and see if some arrangement can not be made for the extension of the time.

Mr. BAILEY. Of course, if there is objection, that will not be necessary.

I ask unanimous consent that the committee may rise informally for the purpose of obtaining an order of the House with reference to the general debate to follow after the hour of half past 2 o'clock.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I think we can not arrive at any conclusion until we get through with the bill and the various amendments which are pending and to be offered.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I will seek the floor and ask unanimous consent of the House to conclude my remarks upon the general features of the bill.

Mr. STEELE. Well, let us finish the bill first.

Mr. BAILEY. The trouble is, I will have no opportunity afterwards.

Mr. STEELE. Oh, I think the gentleman will have a chance.

Mr. HULL. After the various amendments reported by the committee have been considered, we can no doubt arrange to meet the views of the gentleman from Texas and debate the bill for a reasonable time. But until the amendments of the committee are considered objection will be made by various gentlemen on this side of the House.

I move that all debate on the pending amendment be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate having been closed, the question is on agreeing to the amendment proposed by the gentleman from New York [Mr. CUMMINGS].

Mr. PARKER of New Jersey. Mr. Chairman, I have made an objection to the amendment, let me state, on the question of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the objection of the gentleman came too late, the matter having been discussed, and the amendment is before the committee for its determination.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CUMMINGS) there were—ayes 93, noes 121.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I wish to submit a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Would it be in order, and if so I give such notice now, to call for a vote in the House on this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that in the opinion of the Chair, the amendment having been lost, it will not be reported to the House, and will not be before the House for consideration in any form.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert a new paragraph, as follows:

"That the commanding officers of regiments and companies of infantry and cavalry shall strive to secure the greatest possible efficiency in the use of firearms by the enlisted men. To this end there shall be frequent target practice, in which all enlisted men shall participate, and the record of efficiency of every enlisted man shall be preserved, and at the end of each year shall be forwarded to the Secretary of War, who shall present to the enlisted man who has the best record in his regiment for excellence in the use of firearms a gold medal, with appropriate inscription, and a silver medal to the enlisted man who has the best record in his company."

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a point of order.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. HAY. I make the point of order that that amendment is not germane to the bill.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suggest also that it is bimetallism.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will hear the gentleman from Virginia on the point of order, if he desires to be heard.

Mr. HAY. It provides for a system of merit, and so forth, which is not contemplated in the bill in any way, and, moreover, target practice is now provided for by law, and this is an amendment, so far as I can understand, which is in contradistinction to the existing law.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, this bill is intended to promote the efficiency of the Army. That army is most efficient which can most harm, in time of war, the adversary opposed to it. That is accomplished by the use of firearms, and that army which is most efficient in the use of its firearms, if the soldiery have other qualities, will be the one that will prevail.

Now, in our Army we make great effort to insure efficiency in drill, precision of movement, and there are days and weeks and months expended in every organization in simply going through those exercises that go to the appearance of the soldier rather than to his real efficiency.

It is the experience of every man who was in the late civil war that much time was expended in acquiring the capacity for evolution that was never used in actual service. Days, weeks, and months were spent in acquiring a knowledge of the positions of the soldier, of drill, of tactics, of all of those matters, when no man in actual service probably ever saw more than four or five of those movements used. Target practice was neglected. Target practice is neglected.

During the Mexican war the American Army expended 70 cartridges to produce a result—to kill or wound an enemy. At the battle of Murfreesboro General Rosecrans's army expended 117 cartridges to produce a result. Every man who has had experience in the late war knows that hundreds of cartridges were expended upon both sides without producing a result.

We speak with pride of the efficiency of our Navy. Why? Because one shot in every twelve hit a target. Eleven shots were lost and only one was effective.

In our own history we have an illustration of what can be done by marksmen. The men who destroyed Pakenham's army at New Orleans numbered only 2,800 in the firing line, the first rank firing three volleys, the second rank two. Yet the results that followed those five volleys were measured by dead and wounded who lay in front of their position in a number equaling the whole of the firing line. For every two and a half shots fired there was a man killed or wounded. That was the result of the efficiency of those hunters who had had practice with the rifle.

Now, I do not care how much time is spent in drill, in securing the appearance of the Army, it will be inefficient without you have success at the target. That ought to be the great objective of every officer and of every enlisted man—to be efficient in the use of his weapons. I offer this amendment to this section for the purpose of stimulating the men to the utmost competition in securing this excellence.

It will not be expensive in comparison with the vast waste of ammunition in battle. A single battle cost the United States in ammunition more than this will cost the United States in fifteen years. Every man will see at a glance that that soldier who can make a "string" of 10, as they call it in target practice, has double the efficiency on the firing line of the man who can make a string of only 5. What we want is to make these men as efficient as possible, and I know of no provision that we can adopt that will go further in that direction than to stimulate men in this competitive exercise.

Mr. BAILEY. Before I begin, I ask unanimous consent to be permitted to conclude what I have to say.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Texas asks unanimous consent to proceed without limit.

Mr. DALZELL. I have no disposition to object, but if any such arrangement is to be made, it ought to include a similar opportunity on this side.

Mr. BAILEY. I have attempted to make it include the other side.

Mr. HOPKINS. Will the gentleman include with his request that it include this side?

Mr. BAILEY. That would leave but thirty-two minutes, and that would leave but sixteen minutes to a side. I take it that none of us could conclude in that time.

Mr. DALZELL. That would leave only eight minutes apiece to gentlemen on this side.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from Iowa will move that the committee rise, we could fix that the vote be taken at 4 o'clock.

Mr. HEPBURN. I should like to have a vote on this amendment.

Mr. BAILEY. That is proper.

Mr. HULL. We have but one or two sections of the bill to read, and I am perfectly willing, as soon as that is accomplished, to ask unanimous consent that the vote be taken at 4 o'clock in place of 3.

Mr. BAILEY. But it is apparent there are twenty speeches yet to be made. On every line ground for the speeches will open, and it is perfectly apparent that the hour of 3 o'clock will arrive before you have completed your bill.

Mr. HULL. Well, but we ought to conclude the bill in the next ten minutes.

Mr. BAILEY. You should have concluded it within fifteen minutes after we convened this morning. No amendment has been adopted which signifies much, but gentlemen desire to speak, and have the right to speak so far as the question is open to debate, and no one has the right to complain of them exercising their privilege. Gentlemen also have the right to offer amendments.

Mr. HULL. If it were in order, I would move that all debate be closed on the rest of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. It is only competent for the House to do that, and I have suggested to the gentleman the second time that he move that the committee rise and get the House to act.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would suggest that there seems to be but one committee amendment to the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. But we are not on the committee amendments and have not been for the last fifteen minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. That is very true, but there has been no discrimination in that regard. [A cry of "Regular order!"]

Mr. HULL. I would like to accommodate myself to the gentlemen who want to speak, but I know that my colleagues on this side, many of them, are anxious to reach one or two of these amendments.

Mr. BAILEY. I am frank to say that I do not consider it very important, either to myself or to the country, that I should speak upon it, and I will not embarrass the gentleman. I will withdraw the request.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I ask for a vote on the question.

The question was taken; and the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 16. That organizations serving in Cuba, Porto Rico, and the islands of the Pacific may, in the discretion of the President, be recruited in whole or in part from the inhabitants thereof, to whom the legal restrictions upon enlistments in the Army, as regards term of service, age, citizenship, and educational qualifications, shall not apply, and who shall be entitled to such pay and allowances, not exceeding those now authorized, as the President may direct: Provided, That all officers and soldiers appointed or enlisted within the present limits of the United States, or who shall be so appointed or enlisted, shall be entitled, while serving in the islands aforesaid, to additional pay at the rate of 25 per cent upon the rates established by law for their several grades: And provided further, That the cooks authorized by this act shall have the pay and allowances of a sergeant of infantry.

Mr. WARNER. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the committee amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 19, line 2, after the word "said," insert the words "or in Alaska."

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers the following amendment to the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 17 by striking out all that part thereof after the word "Provided," in line 24, page 18, and before the word "That," in line 4, page 19.

Mr. HAY. That is not an amendment to the committee amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment of the committee. The amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois is an independent proposition.

The question was taken; and the amendment of the committee was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois offers the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend section 17 by striking out all that part thereof after the word "Provided," in line 24, page 18, and before the word "That," in line 4, page 19.

The Clerk read the words stricken out, as follows:

That all officers and soldiers appointed or enlisted within the present limits of the United States, or who shall be so appointed or enlisted, shall be entitled, while serving in the islands aforesaid, or in Alaska, to additional pay at the rate of 25 per cent upon the rates established by law for their several grades: And provided further.

Mr. WARNER. Now, Mr. Chairman, the section as it stands increases the pay of the Regular Army serving in Porto Rico, Cuba, and the Pacific islands and Alaska 25 per cent.

We are increasing the Regular Army greatly, but I do not think we should unnecessarily increase the per capita expense of the Regular Army. It is the experience of all men who have served in the Army in the field or on the frontier that they can save money while they are so serving; they are at less expense than when they are in or near populous communities, cities like Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Washington, where it is impossible to save anything, because the demands on the pocketbook are greater. On the frontier or in the field or in the islands the expense will not be anything near what it is in or near these great cities. The officer will get his supplies for his mess from the commissary department, at Government rates, cheaper than he can get them anywhere else, and this increase is totally unnecessary. It will add thousands of dollars each year to the expense of the Army, and we will have difficulty enough in providing the means to pay the expenses of the increased Army without the increase of 25 per cent.

Another thing: It creates classes in the ranks. It provides that men who enlist in the United States shall receive 25 per cent more than men who enlist abroad. Another thing: The old soldier who serves the period of his enlistment, and it expires in Cuba, Porto Rico, Alaska, or the Philippine Islands, and reenlists, will only get the pay of a native who enlists at that place. He would not get the extra 25 per cent; so that an inexperienced man enlisting in the United States receives 25 per cent more than the old soldier who reenlists abroad. I think it is unwise to make, at this time, that discrimination. It is claimed that it will be more expensive for officers who are ordered abroad to maintain their families at home.

I do not think it will, because it will cost no more to maintain them here without the officer at the head of the family than if he were here. For my part, I am opposed to having the Regular Army impeded, hindered, or embarrassed by families.

This amendment, I submit, should be adopted, because instead of injuring it will add to the efficiency of the Army and save the Government and people of the United States many thousands of dollars each year.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this section, with the amendments, be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. WARNER].

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. WARNER) there were—ayes 95, noes 39.

So the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read the next section, as follows:

SEC. 18. That the number of officers authorized by the act of Congress approved February 16, 1891, to be placed on the limited retired list is increased to 500.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I simply rise for the purpose of putting in the RECORD an answer to the gentleman from Kansas [Mr. SIMPSON] and others who have spoken this morning, that there has been no law passed in our past history reducing the Regular Army, officers as well as enlisted men. I have been handed a statement by General WHEELER, who has made a study of the matter, and I want to put it in my remarks. It shows that Congress has repeatedly acted upon the size of the Army, both increasing and decreasing it. I ask that it be read by the Clerk as a part of my time.

The Clerk read as follows:

Prior to 1861 there were thirty-two laws passed by Congress affecting the strength of the Army. Twenty-seven of these laws increased the Regular Army, and but five decreased it. These decreases were March 14, 1800, and March 16, 1802, when the threatening aspects of war with France ceased to exist. The other decreases were March 3, 1815, and March 2, 1821, following the close of the war of 1812; and that of August 14, 1848, after the close of the Mexican war.

All the other laws, all of which may be said to have been enacted in Democratic Administrations, were laws for the increase of the Regular Army. The law of July 29 and August 23, 1861, increased the Regular Army; the law of July 28, 1866, still further increased it. These are the only laws ever passed while Republicans were in power increasing the Regular Army, with the exception of legislation passed by the present Congress.

On March 3, 1869, July 15, 1870, and January 16 and 23, 1874, March 2, 1875, and June 26, 1876, laws were passed decreasing the Regular Army, and these laws were passed in Republican Administrations.

The law of July 28, 1866, fixed the Regular Army at 51,276 men. This, with a population of 35,000,000, gave an army of 1 soldier to every 682 inhabitants. With our present population, including the Philippines, Porto Rico, and Cuba, the present bill, proposing 96,000 men, would give an army of 1 soldier to every 906 inhabitants. Therefore, we see that the Army of 1866 was relatively half as large again as the Army proposed by the present bill.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I move that all debate on this paragraph, with amendments thereto, be closed.

Mr. SIMPSON. If the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] will pardon me, I want to suggest to him that I referred to the executive and not to the legislative power.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman's remarks will show what he referred to.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

Mr. HULL. The gentleman can offer his amendment. I want the debate closed.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] moves that debate on the pending section and the amendments thereto be closed.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. CONNOLLY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment: To strike out section 18, the one providing for the increase in the limited retired list. We have two retired lists for Army officers.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate on this section is closed. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] to strike out section 18.

Mr. CONNOLLY. I ask unanimous consent to call the attention of the House to the law relative to retired Army officers.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I can not consent to that. If I did, consent would have to be given for a reply, and that would extend it indefinitely.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. CONNOLLY] to strike out section 18.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. CONNOLLY) there were 86 ayes and 93 noes.

So the amendment was rejected.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

In time of war retired officers of the Army and retired enlisted men physically able, in the discretion of the President, may be employed on active duty other than in command of troops, and when so employed shall receive the full pay and all allowances of their grade.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from New York [Mr. FISCHER] to section 18.

Mr. COX. Allow me to call attention——

The CHAIRMAN. All debate on this section is closed by order of the committee.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. FISCHER was rejected, there being—ayes 40, noes 92.

The Clerk read the next section of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 18. That hereafter, except as provided in the act of Congress approved July 30, 1892, no person shall be appointed to the position of second lieutenant in the Army after he shall have reached the age of 27 years, and no person shall be so appointed under said act of July 30, 1892, after he shall have reached the age of 30 years; and no person shall be appointed to the position of chaplain in the Army after he shall have reached the age of 40 years, nor until he shall have passed a satisfactory examination as to his physical and educational qualifications.

The amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs was read, as follows:

Strike out the section.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, when the House adjourned yesterday——

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has been recognized.

Mr. COX. I thought I had the right to rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee rises to a parliamentary inquiry. He will state it.

Mr. COX. I am going to state it, if you will give me a chance. This is a proposition, as I understand, to dismiss from the service Army chaplains after they have passed a certain age. Is not that the proposition submitted to the Committee of the Whole?

The CHAIRMAN. The present question is on the amendment submitted by the Committee on Military Affairs to strike out section 18, which is in order.

Mr. COX. I know it is in order; but I want to know whether the old ministers are to be stricken out—— [Cries of "Regular order!"]

The CHAIRMAN. That is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COX. Well, what is it, then? [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is not able to answer. [Renewed laughter.]

Mr. COX. With the utmost courtesy to the Chair and the utmost deference for his rulings, I wish to ask whether the proposition now before the House is not to take out of the service ministers of the gospel after they have arrived at the age of 40?

Mr. HAY. No; it is not.

The CHAIRMAN. In the first place, that is not a parliamentary inquiry. The Chair did not attend to the reading of the section; and the judgment of the gentleman from Tennessee on this subject will be fully as good as that of the Chair.

Mr. COX. I have no doubt of that in the least. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair is very glad to be in accord with the gentleman from Tennessee. The gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] has been recognized, and he will proceed.

Mr. DALZELL. Mr. Chairman, I have listened with great interest to the debate on this bill. I have listened because I was in pursuit of information and because I desired to vote intelligently. Much has been said, and well said, bearing upon its merits, but much also has been said that has no proper relation to the bill and that tends to obscure the issue upon which we are called upon to vote. Questions that are not now before us have been discussed with much heat and passion and in a temper that does not contribute to wise legislation. The future of the Philippines, of Porto Rico, of Cuba, some supposed policy on the part of the President, the conduct of the war, and many other matters of minor interest have furnished material for debate.

Mr. Chairman, it is useless for us to spend time in vain lamentations as to the present situation. Things are not as many of us would like to have them. There are many problems facing us that we would fain have escaped the attempt to solve. But as practical legislators and men of common sense we are bound to face the situation as it exists. Through a series of events that no man at the beginning of the war foresaw, for which no man or men can be held responsible, which are the result of no preconceived human plan or design, it has come about that we are in possession of Porto Rico and the Philippines, and are therefore compelled to deal with their future. It would seem as though the present situation was a step in the evolution of some great plan whereby the progress of the universe is being worked out to final completion.

But, however that may be, we are bound to face the situation. The Republican party is in charge of this Administration and must assume the responsibility of dealing with things as they are. The Republican party can not escape that responsibility, it ought not to seek to escape it, and it will not seek to escape it. It will meet it manfully, courageously, and wisely as may be.

What of duty then, I ask, Mr. Chairman, does the possession of Porto Rico and the Philippines and the relation that we have assumed to Cuba impose upon us? I answer, so far as Cuba is concerned, we are under pledge to drive out the Spaniard and to give to the Cubans a stable government. The Spaniard has been driven out, but it still remains for us to give the Cubans a stable government. So far as the Philippines and Porto Rico are concerned, under the treaty of Paris we have assumed to establish law and order therein, and to protect life and property. The real question, therefore, now before us is, Is the army proposed to be provided for by this bill necessary to enable us to perform these our assumed duties?

Avoiding the question of necessity, some gentlemen object to this bill because a standing army, they say, is a menace to labor. I apprehend that no time need be wasted on that proposition. It is not advanced by any authorized representative of labor, and it finds no justification in anything in our history. My answer to the objection is that American labor need never fear anything from an American army recruited from the American farm and the American home, whose Commander in Chief holds his title by the suffrages, in large part, of American workmen, and which depends for its continued existence upon appropriations made annually by representatives of the American people.

Other gentlemen, Mr. Chairman, object that such a standing army as is made possible by this bill will arouse and encourage a spirit of militarism, which is defined to be "an addiction to war or military practices." There are many easy answers to this proposition. A standing army of 100,000 men is so insignificant compared with a population of 75,000,000 people that its influence will never be felt. It is barely sufficient for defense, and wholly powerless for conquest. But aside from all this, we are essentially a peace-loving people; we are essentially a commercial people, more desirous of pursuing the arts of peace and accumulating wealth than of engaging in strife.

I apprehend that neither of the objections to which I have made reference are entitled to any weight as against the passage of this bill.

Further opposition is made upon the ground that the bill is in aid of an alleged Presidential policy to retain permanent possession of the Philippines.

To that I answer, in the first place, that an increase of the Army is necessary wholly irrespective of the adoption of any particular policy as to these islands. Under the terms of the treaty of Paris we have assumed the duty of maintaining peace and order and protecting life and property therein, and a sufficient and suitable garrison is therefore necessary for that purpose.

In the second place, I deny that the President of the United States, under his constitutional powers, can have any effective policy with respect to the ultimate disposition of the Philippines. I assert that the disposition of these islands belongs to the legislative branch of the Government and that no disposition of them can be made until Congress shall act. The disposition finally to be made of them will be such as Congress in its wisdom shall determine. The time has not yet come for that determination. We do not now have the necessary data upon which to act intelligently. No man can tell to-day what to-morrow will bring forth. I hope we shall not be called upon to act until we have full information as to all matters that ought to affect our judgment.

I hope we shall not be called upon to act until the sober second thought of the people of this country shall have been reached and shall have made its influence felt in Congress.

I further indulge the hope—and upon this I desire to be put upon record—that when we do come to act some policy shall be found which shall permit us honorably to sever all connection with the Philippines, except, perhaps, as to the island of Luzon, and which shall leave them in the enjoyment of a stable government, a free people enjoying all the rights, liberties, and blessings that appertain to a free people.

If I should act upon present knowledge, I should be opposed to the idea of the Philippines ever becoming a part of the United States.

Their distance from us, their relation to European politics, their population by races alien in blood, in habits of life, in modes of thought, in religion, and in conception of government, in my judgment, render their absorption or government by the United States unwise and dangerous.

But, Mr. Chairman, recurring to the subject of a Presidential policy with respect to the Philippines, I affirm, in the third place, that the President has declined to assume any authority save such as is necessary to hold these foreign possessions under military law, so as to preserve order and protect persons and property until Congress shall act.

He has expressly declared time and again that Congress only has power to make final disposition of these acquisitions.

He has not committed himself to any policy as to the future of the Philippines. He has not had the power, nor has he sought to assume it, to commit his party to any such policy. The President has emphasized three things:

First. That the sovereignty assumed pursuant to conquest and treaty is under military law and therefore temporary.

Second. That that sovereignty is to be exercised for the improvement and advantage of the islanders, for the establishment of law and order, and that the laws are to be administered, so far as possible, through the ordinary tribunals.

Third. That the policy ultimately to be adopted with respect to the islands will be such as Congress, not the Executive, shall determine.

I find abundant authority for this statement as to the President's attitude in numerous official papers.

In the President's message to Congress at the beginning of this session he said:

> I do not discuss at this time the government or the future of the new possessions which will come to us as the result of the war with Spain. Such discussion will be appropriate after the treaty of peace shall be ratified. In the meantime and until the Congress has legislated otherwise, it will be my duty to continue the military governments which have existed since our occupation, and give to the people security in life and property and encouragement under a just and beneficent rule.

Here is a distinct recognition of the lack of power upon his part to deal with the future of the new possessions and an equally distinct recognition of the power of Congress to deal with that subject.

The President's recognition of the power of Congress ultimately to deal with the disposition of the Philippines, and his disposition in the meantime to so administer military government as to secure to them, so far as possible, self-government, is witnessed by his instructions to the Secretary of War under date of December 21, 1898.

He therein says:

> The destruction of the Spanish fleet in the harbor of Manila by the United States naval squadron commanded by Rear-Admiral Dewey, followed by the reduction of the city and the surrender of the Spanish forces, practically effected the conquest of the Philippine Islands and the suspension of Spanish sovereignty therein.
> With the signature of the treaty of peace between the United States and Spain by their respective plenipotentiaries at Paris on the 10th instant, and as the result of the victories of American arms, the future control, disposition, and government of the Philippine Islands are ceded to the United States. In fulfillment of the rights of sovereignty thus acquired, and the responsible obligations of government thus assumed, the actual occupation and administration of the entire group of the Philippine Islands become immediately necessary, and the military government heretofore maintained by the United States in the city, harbor, and bay of Manila is to be extended with all possible dispatch to the whole of the ceded territory.

In performing this duty the military commander of the United States is enjoined to make known to the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands that, in succeeding to the sovereignty of Spain, in severing the former political relations of the inhabitants, and in establishing a new political power, the authority of the United States is to be exerted for the security of the persons and property of the people of the islands and for the confirmation of all their private rights and relations. It will be the duty of the commander of the forces of occupation to announce and proclaim in the most public manner that we come, not as invaders or conquerors, but as friends, to protect the natives in their homes, in their employments, and in their personal and religious rights. * * *

Within the absolute domain of military authority, which necessarily is and must remain supreme in the ceded territory until the legislation of the United States shall otherwise provide, the municipal laws of the territory in respect to private rights and property and the repression of crime are to be considered as continuing in force and to be administered by the ordinary tribunals so far as practicable. The operations of civil and municipal government are to be performed by such officers as may accept the supremacy of the United States by taking the oath of allegiance or by officers chosen, as far as may be practicable, from the inhabitants of the islands.

Finally, it should be the earnest and paramount aim of the military administration to win the confidence, respect, and affection of the inhabitants of the Philippines by assuring to them in every possible way that full measure of individual rights and liberties which is the heritage of free peoples, and by proving to them that the mission of the United States is one of benevolent assimilation, substituting the mild sway of justice and right for arbitrary rule.

The same sentiments are again expressed in the President's instructions to the commissioners to the Philippines of date January 20, 1899. He says:

The temporary government of the islands is intrusted to the military authorities, as already provided for by my instructions to the Secretary of War of December 21, 1898, and will continue until Congress shall determine otherwise. The commission may render valuable services by examining with special care the legislative needs of the various groups of inhabitants, and by reporting, with recommendations, the measures which should be instituted for the maintenance of order, peace, and public welfare, either as temporary steps to be taken immediately for the perfection of present administration or as suggestions for future legislation.

It is my desire that, in all their relations with the inhabitants of the islands, the commissioners exercise due respect for all the ideals, customs, and institutions of the tribes and races which compose the population, emphasizing upon all occasions the just and beneficent intentions of the Government of the United States. It is also my wish and expectation that the commissioners may be received in a manner due to the honored and authorized representatives of the American Republic, duly commissioned on account of their knowledge, skill, and integrity as bearers of the good will, the protection, and the richest blessings of a liberating rather than a conquering nation.

And still again in the President's message to General Otis and Admiral Dewey, on January 8, 1899, he says, speaking of the inhabitants of the Philippines:

They will come to see our benevolent purpose and recognize that before we can give their people good government our sovereignty must be complete and unquestioned.

We accepted the Philippines from high duty in the interest of their inhabitants and for humanity and civilization. Our sacrifices were with this high motive. We want to improve the condition of the inhabitants, securing them peace, liberty, and the pursuit of their highest good.

Surely, Mr. Chairman, it can not be contended, in view of these official utterances, that the President of the United States has undertaken to commit either himself or anyone else to any ultimate policy with respect either to the final retention or to the abandonment of the Philippines. He leaves the question where it belongs, to the future.

Mr. Chairman, having disposed of the objections to the bill, I now recur to the real question at issue. Is it necessary to the performance of our assumed duties that we should pass this bill?

Under the legislation pursuant to which our present Army exists it is made obligatory on the President at the end of the war to reduce the Army to a peace basis as it existed before the war began.

If, then, the treaty of peace now pending in the Senate be ratified, as we have every reason to believe it will be, the Army of the United States, in the absence of legislation, will be reduced to about 27,000 men. All over that number in the Regular Army will be discharged, and the entire volunteer force will be returned to their homes.

This was the strength of the Army when we were at peace with all the world, when we had no interests to guard, no duties to perform in Hawaii, Porto Rico, the Philippines, and Cuba.

It is perfectly manifest, therefore, without any argument, that a reorganization of the Army by an increase of its numbers is now necessary. So much will be conceded by all.

But to what extent is the increase necessary?

The bill under discussion as amended provides for the creation of a regular army to consist of 50,000 men as a minimum, and of 100,000 men, at the discretion of the President, as a maximum.

The possible necessity for an army of 100,000 men is due to two causes:

First. To the number of men required at the various places that we are called upon to garrison—Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines, Hawaii, and our own United States.

Second. Because in tropical countries it is absolutely essential to the preservation of the Army and of the lives of its men that there should be relays from time to time. Our soldiers are incapable of withstanding for more than a limited season the dangers incident to life, and especially garrison and camp life, in the Tropics.

It becomes necessary, therefore, that from time to time regiments shall be recalled and others sent to take their places.

The passage of this bill does not necessarily mean an army of 100,000 men.

How many men shall constitute the Army is a matter to be left to the discretion of the President. Who shall object to the exercise of that discretion?

Does anyone, in view of his record, distrust the judgment or the patriotism of our President? I do not stop to eulogize him. He needs no eulogy at my hands. History will vindicate his course throughout all this Spanish war as that of a discreet, courageous, and patriotic Chief Magistrate, who at the beginning sought by all honorable means in his power to avert war, and who when war came prosecuted it with an earnestness of purpose, a vigor, and a success which were worthy of the high office that he holds as Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States.

In point of fact, the question as to the number of men necessary to constitute our new Army is a question upon which we ourselves, being uninformed, should inform ourselves by the testimony of competent witnesses. I can conceive of no more competent witnesses upon this subject than those in the administration of the Government, who are charged with its responsibilities. They all agree that the Army now necessary should consist of 100,000 men.

The Secretary of War in his report to the President says:

In view of the needs of a military force in the islands occupied by the United States, it is earnestly recommended that the Regular Army be permanently increased to 100,000 men and the requisite officers; that a portion of this Army be recruited from the inhabitants of those islands, to be mustered into the service of the United States and commanded by officers of our Army, discretion, however, to be given the President to make appointments of officers from the force so recruited.

These men are acclimated, understand the language and habits of their countrymen, and their enlistment will not only give them employment but also have a tendency to enable the Government to get into closer touch with their people than it would otherwise be able to do. This would also relieve our own people from serving in those climates to a large extent, and would, moreover, enable the volunteers to be mustered out of the service and return to the avocations of civil life.

The distinction between the regular and the volunteer is very sharply drawn. The regular enters the service because he prefers the life of a soldier. Not so the volunteer. He enlists for an active campaign; when that is over and the enemy has laid down its arms, at once desires to return to civil life.

I desire to emphasize in this connection the distinction made between the volunteer and the regular soldier.

The volunteer soldier is a splendid fighter. He is of little account for garrison duty. If he can not fight for his country, he wants to render it better service in the ordinary walks of life than he can hope to render it by standing on guard and playing the part of a policeman. He ought not to be called upon to render any such unnecessary service.

I quote next the President of the United States. In his last annual message to Congress he says:

The importance of legislation for the permanent increase of the Army is manifest, and the recommendation of the Secretary of War for that purpose has my unqualified approval. There can be no question that at this time, and probably for some time in the future, 100,000 men will be none too many to meet the necessities of the situation. At all events, whether that number shall be required permanently or not, the power should be given to the President to enlist that force if in his discretion it should be necessary; and the further discretion should be given him to recruit for the Army within the above limit from the inhabitants of the islands with the government of which we are charged.

To the testimony of the Secretary of War and the President of the United States I add the testimony of General Miles, the Major-General in Command of the Army; the testimony of General Schofield, late in command of the Army; and the testimony of Adjutant-General Corbin, all of whom agree that the present situation demands an army of 100,000 men.

Mr. Chairman, I do not find any answer to this testimony, and as a legislator in my country's interest I can find no ground upon which to ignore it.

But, Mr. Chairman, laying aside generalities and coming down to details, I have here a statement from the Adjutant-General of the Army showing the distribution of both volunteer and regular regiments in the Army, and their strength, as they appear according to the latest returns received in the Adjutant-General's Office. That statement shows the following disposition of troops:

	United States.	Cuba.	Philippines.	Porto Rico.
Regulars	28,400	12,507	12,706	4,376
Volunteers	23,480	33,382	16,411	2,231
Total	51,880	45,889	29,117	6,607

Volunteers, Honolulu, 341.

It will appear from these figures that if the Army should be reduced to its strength upon a peace basis, in accordance with the law as it existed prior to the beginning of the war, there would not be a single soldier left in either Cuba, Porto Rico, the Philippines, or Hawaii.

If the Regular Army should be reduced to a basis of 50,000 troops, there would be left less than 22,000 regulars to garrison Cuba, Porto Rico, Hawaii, and the Philippines. No one, I apprehend, would contend that such a garrison for our outlying possessions would be in any wise adequate to meet the present emergency.

According to the testimony of our evacuation commission in Cuba, consisting of Generals Wade and Butler and Admiral Sampson, there will be required for the proper protection of our interests in Cuba an army of 50,000 men. General Brooke, who is now in command in Cuba, agrees with the evacuation commission in this statement. General Otis and Admiral Dewey agree that we ought to have in the Philippines an army of 25,000 men. According to the testimony of General Miles and others we ought to have at least 5,000 troops in Porto Rico, and all our generals agree that there is required in the United States an army of at least 29,000 men—15,000 upon the frontier and 14,000 for our coast defenses.

Leaving Hawaii out of consideration altogether, we have thus, according to the testimony of these very competent generals, a necessity for an army of 109,000 men. Of course, estimates vary as they are made by these various generals, looking at the matter from different standpoints, but upon the whole it is fair to conclude that there is little safety, under present conditions, in our depriving ourselves of the power of summoning, in case of emergency, at least 100,000 men.

It is to be borne in mind, as I have already stated, that the necessity for the relief of certain of our troops because of climatic conditions, and the substitution of others in their places, adds to the necessity for making provision for an adequate force to meet any possible emergency. Under these circumstances it does seem to me that the discretion proposed to be given to the President by the bill now under discussion is not only a wise one in the public interest, but one of commanding necessity.

Mr. Chairman, it will not do to underrate the difficulties of our present position. Nor will it do to set them aside upon the pretense that the Army is to be used for any other purpose than that of securely keeping the possessions that we have and preserving order therein and the supremacy of law.

There are in Cuba to-day from twenty-eight to thirty thousand Spanish soldiers. There are 38,000 Cuban troops clamorous for pay, discontented and jealous of American rule. There is a Spanish population and a Cuban population. There are outlaws and beggars, unfortunates of many classes, and all the elements of riot and disorder. Nothing but the strong arm of the law, backed by the strong arm of force, can evolve out of this chaos of misfortune and lawlessness a stable form of government. Nothing but the soldiers called for by our evacuation commission and now called for by General Brooke will enable us to redeem our pledge to give to the Cubans a stable form of government.

There are 18,000 Spanish troops still in the Philippines. There are merchants, bankers, capitalists, planters forming a large part of the population and forming the law-abiding part who need the strong arm of United States authority for their protection. There are insurgents whose history shows them to be adventurers, masquerading as soldiers of freedom when they are only soldiers of fortune. These are the enemies of good government. Permanent good government can never be evolved from the rule of a mob. Governments derive their just powers from the consent of the governed. But to ascertain this two things must concur. There must be such conditions as will make possible the orderly and accurate ascertainment of the consent; and those to be governed must be competent to give an intelligent consent.

Whether it be in Cuba or in the Philippines or elsewhere, a stable government in which the rights of each and all as freemen are recognized can only follow an established reign of law.

To furnish such reign of law is the mission of the United States. To fulfill that mission an army is necessary, not for conquest, not for slaughter, but to keep in awe the unruly, to hold up the arms of justice, and to execute its decrees. For that reason this bill ought to pass.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment of the Committee on Military Affairs to strike out section 18.

Mr. HULL. I simply want to call attention to the fact that if this amendment of the committee be adopted it will remove all restrictions as to the appointment of chaplains and as to the appointment of second lieutenants in the Army. With this statement I ask for a vote, unless some other gentleman desires to speak on the amendment. [Cries of "Vote!" "Vote!"]

Mr. COX. I should like to be recognized for one minute.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say that it is very important this amendment should be voted down, because it is one of those amendments of the committee which provide for political appointments. I trust, therefore, that members on this side of the House at least will vote against it.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman, I want to be recognized for just one minute. As I understood it in the committee, and as I understand it now, the effect of this proposition is to exclude ministers of the gospel who are chaplains in the Army from service as such after they have passed the age of 40 years. Now, sir, the best chaplains I ever saw were, I think, those who were more than 40 years of age. I am in favor of the old fellows staying inside the line.

Mr. HAY. I call the attention of my colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee, to the fact that if the amendment proposed by the committee be voted down no person who is now a chaplain in the Army will be taken out of the Army.

Mr. COX. That is what I want.

Mr. MEYER of Louisiana. Mr. Chairman, the report made by the Committee on Military Affairs on this bill for the reorganization of the Army of the United States is mainly devoted to an exposition of the reasons which suggest this particular form or method of organization over other plans which have been favored by high authority.

I do not propose in my remarks to go into this field of discussion. I will say, however, that if it be deemed necessary to reorganize the Army, the present moment is not propitious for the operation. Only a few short days, comparatively, of this short session now remain, and these must be largely devoted to the annual appropriation bills, if it be admitted, as it ought to be, that the intelligent judgment of Congress should be applied to these bills, both in the interest of the public service and the heavily burdened taxpayer of the land.

If we are to have an Army reorganization, it should be begun at some long session of Congress, dealt with advisedly, and not patched up hastily, with hardly time for the committee to act upon it, much less for Congress to examine the measure proposed. There were "brave men before Agamemnon," and the work of those great men who planned our present system might well be allowed to stand until we know that we are to get a better one in its place.

A LARGE STANDING ARMY A MENACE TO LIBERTY.

But while these details of Army reorganization may be interesting, and even highly important, they sink into insignificance compared with the question whether our standing army, in time of peace, shall be increased from twenty-seven or twenty-eight thousand men, at which it stood a year ago, to 100,000 men.

It is true that the majority report says that the bill "fixes no maximum strength for the Army," but the committee admit that the bill proceeds on the assumption that the Government will require about 100,000 men for the defense of the frontier, for coast defense, and to maintain our authority in the islands for whose "good order and government," say the committee, "this nation is now responsible." Such is the proposition flippantly embodied, or rather sandwiched, in some eight lines of a technical report of 16 pages.

The question of this vast increase of the standing army is deemed, apparently, by the authors of this report, to be of less consequence than the regimental or battalion organization of the artillery and a proper provision for the rank of horse doctors.

Our fathers, who framed the Constitution under which we are supposed to act, and who called this free Government into being, held a very different opinion. They held a large standing army to be a menace to public liberty. They had before them the lessons of history, ancient and modern. They saw how the possession of a large standing army had, in all ages, encouraged rulers of state to subvert the Government and destroy the rights of the people, and had given these rulers the power to effect their designs.

It was the standing army of Great Britain that was used in the endeavor to crush and subjugate the thirteen revolting colonies. This army was reenforced by a hired force of regulars brought from Hesse, and it was the patriot army of the colonies, drawn from the body of the American people, that won the contest for liberty.

The British people were much divided in respect to this war, and only a regular force could have been wielded as one man by King George for seven long years to destroy the rights which were the colonial heritage of Englishmen and Americans.

I would ask you how has Turkish despotism and cruelty been maintained for a century or more? It has been only by a large regular force. The janizary has been the convenient and effective tool of the Sultan. Go back to the French Revolution. What force was it that stood by Louis XVI and defied the popular uprising for liberty against wrong? It was a regular force.

Look through the modern history of Europe. How is absolutism maintained, tyranny perpetuated or extended, and the just rights of the people denied? How is progress arrested, public opinion stifled, the press silenced, needless wars, with countless suffering, brought about by this or that autocrat? Is it not by great standing armies, augmented from time to time, mere victims brought by conscription under this car of Juggernaut, mere human beings wrested from useful pursuits and torn from family and home to meet the demands of an assumed military necessity?

These monarchs, these lovers of war and of a great military establishment, would spurn the idea of a volunteer or citizen soldiery, serving for short periods and then returning to the body of the people. Such a force would naturally sympathize with the people from whom they come. They could not be used for a wanton and wicked oppressor of the people. They would probably, even under orders, hesitate to fire upon the people. Just in proportion as the army is separated from the people by long periods of service and augmented to a large force and easily handled, as a mere machine or a Gatling gun would be employed, the usurping and tyrannical ruler is made more secure in his treason to human rights and the people are rendered more helpless under the yoke of militarism until their deliverance becomes almost impossible.

Of course there is a pretense for all this; aye, pretexts more plausible than those employed by our advocates of a large standing army. "Order must be preserved;" and so order reigned in Warsaw amid scenes of blood over a conquered nation.

What is this "order?" Is it the order of virtue and law, based on human rights and divine justice? Or is it the order of violence, of conquest, of obstruction, of repression, of burden, of taxation, of a multitude of officers, of a horde of pensioners upon the body politic; of vampires and universal corruption?

Is it not the "order" that blights human hopes and paralyzes the hand of industry, that writes its decree in blood amidst the tears of the widow and the orphan?

Is it not true that the imposition of slavery upon the people of Europe and other countries has always been accomplished by means of huge standing armies?

Look over the map of Europe to-day in every nook and corner, and what do you find its greatest burdens and curse; the potent cause of poverty, misery, and despair? Is it not the great standing army, steadily, perhaps stealthily, increased from time to time on cunning pretexts, until its terrible proportions darken the whole land?

OUR GOVERNMENT'S EARLY POLICY.

It is to the eternal honor of the founders of our Government and those who have for the most part administered its affairs that they had read the lessons of history aright and were able to foresee the mischiefs and misery which would befall us if we fell into the practice of having large standing armies. It was not a matter that could be regulated by constitutional provision. It was necessary that the power given Congress by the Constitution to raise armies should be ample, in order to meet all possible emergencies, but the power was placed where the representatives of a free people, inspired by patriotism, could regulate the force to be employed and curtail it as the public interest might demand. Thus a policy was fixed in the very beginning of having only a small standing army as a peace establishment. There was a wholesome fear of it which permeated all our people.

It was not a cowardly fear, but the reverse. Had they loved liberty less, they would have felt far less apprehension of fatal consequences. It was partly a proud consciousness of the part the American people had played in two wars—the French war and that with Great Britain from 1775 to 1783—that made them ready to rely mainly on a volunteer force.

Thus the policy of a small standing army was adopted in the early days of this Government. Yet how easy it would have been for certain patriots of this day, had they lived then, to declaim of the necessity for a large regular force to be ready at any hour to meet Great Britain, already strongly posted on our northern boundary, or Spain, or France, bounding us on the south, or the large, fierce, and intractable Indian tribes on borders to the west, conflict with whom seemed to be almost a necessary incident of our progress westward.

OUR SUCCESSES DURING THE WAR OF 1812.

But these plausible considerations did not alter the policy of the great statesmen of the past and present century. Not even when the war of 1812 with Great Britain became necessary was their reliance placed mainly on the Regular Army. This Army had consisted of some 3,000 men prior to 1811, but it was now increased to 35,000 men to meet the most powerful and dangerous enemy that could possibly be arrayed against us, and the President was also authorized to accept the services of 50,000 volunteers. The successes on land during the war of 1812 were about equally balanced, save at New Orleans, where 6,000 volunteer troops under Andrew Jackson defeated double that number of British regulars, veterans of the Peninsular war, conquerors of the mighty Napoleon.

I do not refer merely to the victory of the 8th of January. I include the attack made by Jackson with the volunteers upon the British regulars in their own camp, almost the very first day they had landed near New Orleans. Peace had already been made, although the fact was not known at New Orleans, and the necessary steps were at once taken by Congress to reduce the Army to a small peace establishment. The general plan of national defense of that day was to have a small standing army as a nucleus and a rallying point, but with a corps of well-trained officers ready to command and drill additional troops, and, lastly, to have an efficient navy.

There was no apprehension felt that the Navy could be used against the public liberty, and the question of a navy was simply one of public necessity and the proper limitation of expense.

STATESMANLIKE VIEWS OF JOHN C. CALHOUN AND OTHERS.

There is a report from Mr. Calhoun, Secretary of War, dated January, 1819, which embodies the prevalent views of both the military men and statesmen of that period, which, coming from a man of his eminent genius, is worthy of our attention. Referring to the provisions for military academies, the report says:

So far from graduating the number or extent of our military academies by the want of the Army in time of peace, the opposite principle would probably be more correct; that is, in proportion as our regular military establishment is small, the Government ought to be careful to disseminate, by education, a knowledge of the art of war.

The Army itself is a practical school of this art, which, except in the higher branches, may, when it bears a large proportion to the population of the country, supersede other modes of perpetuating or disseminating this indispensable art. But in a country situated as ours is, with a small standing army, and far removed from any power from which we have much to fear, the important knowledge of the art of defending our shores will, in a long peace, without the particular patronage of the Government, be nearly lost.

The establishment of military academies is the cheapest and safest mode of producing and perpetuating this knowledge. The Government ought to furnish the means to those who are willing to bestow their time to acquire it. The cadets who can not be provided for in the Army will return to private life; but in the event of war, their knowledge will not be lost to the country. The Government may then avail itself of their military science; and though they may not be practically acquainted with all of the details of the duty in the Army, they will acquire it in a much shorter time than those who have not had the advantage of a military education. No truth is better supported by history than that, other circumstances being nearly equal, victory will be on the side of those who have the best instructed officers. The duties of a soldier are few and simple, and with well-instructed officers they can be acquired in a short time, as our own experience and that of other countries has satisfactorily proved. To form competent officers, in the present improved state of art of war, is much more difficult; as an officer, besides a knowledge of the duties belonging to the soldier, has others of a more difficult nature to acquire, and which can only be acquired by a long experience or by regular military education.

Coming down to a much later period, we find such eminent and experienced statesmen as John Quincy Adams, John C. Calhoun, and Thomas H. Benton, though differing widely on some questions, urging and advocating a radical reduction of Army expenses. The cost of our Regular Army per man was then barely one-third of what it is now.

OUR SOLDIERS IN THE MEXICAN WAR.

The war with Mexico, so glorious to our arms, was fought mainly by a volunteer force.

I would not be understood by this to reflect in the slightest degree upon the regulars, who did their full duty on every field where they were engaged; but Congress wisely authorized the President to accept the services of 50,000 volunteers, and more than 300,000 men responded to serve on a foreign soil, in a tropical or semitropical climate.

It was these volunteers who fought the battle of Buena Vista against four times their numbers of Mexicans; and though their flank was turned in the progress of the battle, and the enemy had penetrated to their rear, they continued to fight until victory was accomplished. The volunteers made a large proportion of the force which, under Scott, marched from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico, fighting one bloody battle after another, until our troops pressed on after storming Chapultepec.

A volunteer force under General Quitman, of Mississippi, was the first to enter the gates of the City of Mexico.

I cite all this as an ample proof that even in a war of invasion, in a tropical clime, but with an object adequate to fire the hearts of the American people, you can fully depend upon a volunteer force to uphold the flag and to make all just and necessary sacrifices.

EFFICIENCY OF VOLUNTEERS DEVELOPED BY OUR CIVIL WAR.

But, Mr. Chairman, if there were any doubt as to the capacity of the American volunteer to do his duty and perform a great part in war, turn to the history of the civil war between the States from 1861 to 1865.

Who were the troops that for two days fought the obstinate and bloody battle of Shiloh, or Pittsburg Landing? They were volunteers on both sides, and they had been only a short time in service.

Take the army that, under Lee, fought McClellan's troops around Richmond. They were largely conscripts, with barely six or eight weeks of training, who had never been in battle before. Yet these men at Gaines's Mill, after being repulsed three times, were rallied to a fourth and successful charge against the enemy's breastworks.

Take the Federal Army which fought so obstinately in all these battles. They were mainly volunteers, better drilled and equipped it may be than their opponents, but volunteers, nevertheless—not regulars.

I single out these two great battles because most of the men engaged in them had never been under fire before. They were new troops.

At a later period, when seasoned and under a volunteer organization, you find the bloody fights of Stone River, Fredericksburg, the second Manassas, Gettysburg, the Wilderness, Spottsylvania Court-House, Cold Harbor, and the rest, with their terrible losses on both sides.

Probably many of the old Army officers went into the civil war with a distrust of the volunteer, but after a fair trial they got bravely over this doubt. It is stated that during the whole civil war the permanent army of the United States never exceeded 25,000 regulars. The Government found by experience that not more were needed. They found that they could rely upon the volunteers.

As for the Confederate government, they did indeed authorized prior to the beginning of hostilities, a regular force of 10,000 men, but only a few hundred of these were actually raised. Their fighting, unsurpassed in history, was done by volunteers or conscripts.

NO REVERSAL OF OUR POLICY NECESSARY.

It is now proposed to reverse all this policy and to augment our standing army in time of peace from 28,000 to 100,000 men. I say in time of peace; I repeat it; the war with Spain is over. No war is going on. Spain is vanquished. Her fleet is annihilated. Her colonies are all lost to her. Most of her troops—nearly all—have left Cuba. All her soldiers have departed from Porto Rico. In the Philippines all her troops have surrendered either to the insurgents or to the United States. There is not the remotest possibility of a renewal of the conflict. You all know this fact. Where, then, is our enemy? What nation threatens us? All the powers of Europe profess warm friendship. Not one of them has an interest in a conflict with the United States.

Not one of them could attack us by land successfully. We are protected by the ocean, by distance, by our vast area, by our large population, by our enormous resources, and the known martial spirit of our people. The only power that could give us any serious trouble is Great Britain, and she most warmly desires our friendship and alliance. In a good understanding with this country she places the highest interest. I need scarcely dwell on so notorious a fact as this. Where, then, is the necessity, real or pretended, of a large increase of our military establishment? The reason for it ought to be frankly stated, or the project should be promptly abandoned.

And, Mr. Chairman, it seems that we are reduced somewhat to speculation touching the possible motives of this extraordinary application for an extraordinary increase of our Regular Army, with an extraordinary expense. Let us explore the ground around us and see if we can find the causes impelling this remarkable demand.

OPPOSING INTERESTS OF CAPITAL AND LABOR.

Sir, it can not be denied that in the last few years there has been an increasing friction and distrust between the opposing interests of capital in all its forms and labor. At times there has been actual conflict. Bloody encounters have ensued. Despite all the pretenses of universal peace and general prosperity indulged in by some persons, it has seemed to be feared that more collisions may occur in the near future.

A few years ago a great railroad magnate proposed publicly to have a permanent standing army of 40,000 men. He undoubtedly desired to keep the discontented laborer in his place; to make him submissive and tractable. Public opinion did not echo the suggestion. This gentleman was much behind the times—I mean our times. Forty thousand men would not content the class of people in the United States who rely on an armed force instead of justice to insure peace and order.

To compose any pending possible conflict between capital and labor, there are better methods than a permanent military force of the United States. A wise and just financial and monetary policy, a reduction of taxation, the abolition of needless expenses, a surrender of unworthy schemes of conquest, a recognition that the producers of this country are entitled to fair consideration, the restraint of the great trusts that oppress our poor and menace our liberties; these are the better and nobler methods to preserve order and harmony among all classes of the American people.

We have no official suggestion that a large standing army would be desirable at home to enforce the policies of capital, but I can not disguise from myself that a number of persons desire to employ the favorite European method for dealing with these questions, and for this reason wish an increase of the standing army to 100,000 men—even more, if they could get them.

It would indeed be extraordinary if the desire of promotion and increased rank, pay, and power contributed nothing to this pressure for a great army. This is only human nature. No one should be surprised to discover it. But it is our duty to study other things besides the mere gratification of personal interests. We have the American taxpayer to consider. He does not surround these Halls or come to our committee rooms; but his is the toil and the industry and the sacrifice that supports the whole machinery of our Government—executive, legislative, and judicial, Army and Navy.

INDIAN WARS A THING OF THE PAST.

Before I pass on I wish to call your attention to the fact that one important service for which we needed our small standing army for a century or more no longer exists. The Indian wars, which involved so much danger to our Western settlers and pioneers, and so much of hardship, courage, and endurance to our Army, are now practically a thing of the past. The extension of our railroads and the wonderful growth of our Western population have settled the problem of Indian wars. Two or three thousand regulars can now do the work, by increased facilities of transportation and communication, that four times that number would have found it difficult to perform thirty or forty years ago. The Indians have been surrounded by civilization and have surrendered to its powerful forces. Gathered into reservations, they are the prisoners of the Government, and they understand full well what folly it would be to resist its power. A small force of regulars, aided by the State militia assembled, can check or punish any possible disorder arising from the Indian. This excuse for a large Army no longer exists.

COAST DEFENSES PROVIDED FOR.

It is hardly necessary to touch upon the provision for coast defenses. We have provided additional forts and high-power guns, and we have provided for artillerists to man them. A small regular force would suffice for this purpose. If it be necessary in case of war to support these batteries by an infantry force, we have it well provided in our National Guard, existing already at all exposed points.

Remember, Mr. Speaker, how easy it would be and how speedy an operation to concentrate troops by rail at any point of attack on our seaboard, and the despised National Guard in such service, as well as any other patriotic duty, can be fully relied upon as a bulwark. But where is the attack to come from? Where is our possible enemy, if we pursue a policy of peace and pacific development?

Recognizing the natural desire of our Army officers for an imposing force and for the additional prestige and promotions that would go with this expansion of the Army; recognizing also that there is a class in this country, small it may be, but influential, and anxious to augment it for service in settling labor controversies, I come to the principal cause of this extraordinary increase of our regular and permanent military force. It is hinted at pretty broadly in one little paragraph of the committee's report. We are to have 100,000 troops "to maintain our authority in the islands for whose good order and government this nation is now responsible."

OUR NEW DEPARTURE REVIEWED.

Here is the whole business. We may have evasion, reserves, quibbles elsewhere without end, but a plain man, a wayfaring man, will not be deceived by them. It is easy to see where we are drifting, and not drifting, but marching by rapid steps that can not be recalled unless we stop right now and call a halt. It is a new departure; let us look at it.

I admit, sir, that we committed ourselves to expel Spanish authority and Spanish soldiers from Cuba and to give the Cuban people the opportunity to form an independent, orderly, and stable government of their own. What number of Federal troops are necessary for this purpose, assuming that we are acting in good faith?

Are they hostile to a free and independent government of their own? No one pretends that. Are they such anarchists, so disorderly, such brigands, so unfit for home rule and self-government, that we must have an army of fifty or twenty thousand men to educate them to the point where they may be turned loose to govern themselves? If this be so, it will be asked by many, why was American blood shed, our treasure expended, and our people taxed in order to give freedom to men whom you can not trust? No, sir; the proposition can not be maintained. The time has come, or will be upon us in another month, after all the Spanish troops have been sent home, when the steps can and ought to be taken to give this people of Cuba a constituent assembly, a government of their own choice, their own laws, rules, police, and system of taxation. Why not?

How long do you propose to stay there? Is military government by aliens a proper education for home rule? How long is the babe to be suckled at the breast? How long is this burden to be imposed upon the American taxpayers, and this, too, under the pretense that we are responsible for good order and government in Cuba? I deny the proposition. We entered into no such bond. There is no such obligation. In three months from to-day the whole affair of turning over the government of Cuba to their own people should be concluded. If it be not promptly done, it will be for some reason that can not be frankly stated to the American people. It is mooted here and there, almost everywhere, that Cuba is not to be given up, and that our pledge to withdraw is to be dishonored. A demand for 20,000 regulars to garrison the island has a strong squint in that direction. But, sir, it will not do to deceive the people of Cuba or of this country.

But we must garrison Porto Rico also. Why so? Was it the object of the Cuban war to capture and hold Porto Rico as a dependency? Are the people friendly to our rule, or not? If they are friendly, you need no garrison. If they want home rule, a government of their own, why not let them have it? In either case you do not need to spend from five to ten millions of dollars per annum to hold that little island.

Ah, sir, but there are the Philippines; we must have 25,000 regulars for that purpose. Did we go to war to free the Philippines? Not at all. We knew but little, if anything, about them; we cared less. When Admiral Dewey sailed from China, it was to strike the Spanish fleet. We had no place in Eastern waters where his fleet could remain. He had been ordered off under the rules that bind neutral powers.

But while he gloriously defeated the Spanish fleet, and was able to stay or not as he pleased, it was not he who after years of effort, years of oppression and suffering, had practically extinguished Spanish rule on these islands, leaving them only the city of Manila and one or two minor points. Nineteen-twentieths, fully, of their territory had been wrested from the Spanish before Dewey's victory. A large part of these islands, it is asserted, was never occupied by Spain. Up to this hour, with a large military force, some 20,000 men, I believe, we have not occupied one square mile in twenty of these islands. The Filipinos hold the remainder.

We hold the city and bay of Manila and very little more. It is evident that the people there do not desire our rule. It may be that they lack the element of good government, and it seems they are not fit for a republic as we conceive it. But they made a better fight for home rule than the Cubans, or else they were more resolute to obtain it.

We can have a naval station in these islands at our pleasure, but if we are to govern these people we shall need more than 25,000 men.

If we do not seek to maintain our authority over them, we will need no army and we will have no war. If we do have a war, it will be one of our own choosing, costly, bloody, tedious, and without glory or honor. Where is the American hero that wants to gain laurels by beating and subjugating these people? And where is the American State in the Union so rich, so prosperous, that the people are eager to pay their share of the one or two hundred millions of the additional taxes per annum that this folly will entail?

Remember that to defend your far colony when you conquer it, and to hold it, you will have to do more than keep down insurgents who may be as hard to get at as were the Seminole Indians in Florida, when four or five thousand savages during a series of campaigns in swamps and morasses defied the whole power of the United States and the skill of their best generals. In the Philippines you will have to follow your foe from island to island, amid tropical swamps, jungles, and thickets, where he is at home and you are not; where he can stand the climate and your gallant men will be rotting like sheep from disease. If your commissary and medical supplies failed you in Cuba, right at your own doors, how will you manage them six or eight thousand miles across the Pacific Ocean? But I speak only of land operations in the Philippines.

Suppose, while you are engaged in putting down these rebels in the Philippines—a wearisome business of years and years perhaps, a task as endless as that of Sisyphus—you have a difficulty with one of the four or five great maritime powers. How will you protect your colony, or what you have of it? How will you guard against a chance superiority of naval force against you? Read over again, if you please, the story of the capture of Cornwallis at Yorktown. Therefore, to guard against such a catastrophe as that, we must at once make ourselves the strongest naval power in the world in the Pacific seas and see to it that we do not fall behind. We must do that or else make a bargain with England, and on her own terms.

If we do not do this, we must build so strong a navy to guard our distant colony as to be able to match any possible combination of unfriendly powers. When we have done all this, whipped in our rebels and awed all covetous rivals, the question will next arise what profit will it bring us? Will it bring us one dollar in revenue or trade where we spend $50 to make our conquest?

COST OF CONQUEST OF THE PHILIPPINES.

Let us estimate the cost of all this. I have seen various estimates of the annual cost of conquering and holding the Philippines. One of these places the—

Pay and transportation of troops at	$75,000,000
The extra naval force	15,300,000
Annual charge for enlarging Navy	12,000,000
Pensions due to wars and diseases	5,000,000
Fortifications and improvements	10,000,000
A civil government (so called)	3,000,000
Total cost	121,300,000

This leaves out any charge for educating the Filipinos so as to become citizens of States or reconciled to being subjects or citizens of this new imperial Government. But it adds largely over a hundred million dollars to our present heavy expenditures, with a large deficit staring us in the face.

But the imperial European system of conquering and holding colonies once begun will not end. We can not stop after we once begin. We must go on with our naval and military armaments. If we are to imitate European governments, we must equal their establishments. To rival the naval establishment of Great Britain and France we must proceed at once to multiply fourfold our present naval appropriations. To have only 100,000 regular troops, thus swelling our expenses for soldiers and pensions to $250,000,000 per annum, would be only a beginning.

The sea forces of the European powers I find to be thus stated:

Russia	860,000
France	605,413
German Empire	585,440
Austria-Hungary	385,697
Great Britain	163,567

As respects the peace establishment of Great Britain, I believe it to be largely underestimated in this table. I believe that there can not be less than 150,000 troops in India—European and native troops. I shall not pause to dwell upon this impressive table. It ought to be a beacon and warning to us to avoid the beginning of evil. How much of evil there may lurk in it may be partly gathered from a speech by an eminent Englishman. Said he:

> Out of the life of every German, every Frenchman, every Italian, every Austrian, and every Prussian the respective Governments of those countries take three years for compulsory military service. If they estimated these years at eight hours per day for six days a week, they would find that it came to this: That out of the lives of Europeans in these nations no less than seven thousand five hundred hours were taken for compulsory military service, during which time the individual so deprived was, for purposes of the community, as a whole, by his labor, as idle, as useless, as unprofitable as if he had never been born.

Now, sir, I can add nothing to the impressiveness of this statement. I am willing to make a reasonable, aye, liberal, increase to our Navy. I do not regret or deprecate the addition we have made to our coast defenses. Our great cities, our harbors are all made secure by these defenses, by our monitors, by torpedoes, or can be made so immediately. But when it comes to a great standing army, when it comes to a proposal to increase or keep up our present large expenditures and heavy taxation, I feel that we owe something to the producers and taxpayers of the land, and especially to the suffering and impoverished people of the Southern States. In their name I ask a reduction of taxes. In their name I ask you to preserve the peace, to get up no war in the Philippines or anywhere else, and to reduce your armies as soon as possible.

IMPERIALISM—WHAT IS IT?

We have come to the parting of the ways. You say you do not want an imperial policy. In what does imperialism consist? In the name of Imperator, or in the actual power? In the form or title, or in the substance? It consists in consolidated power here in your President, in an enormous patronage at home and abroad; in a large executive discretion, in a great army and glittering uniforms, the man on horseback at every crossroad and street corner; in subject, distant colonies governed or terrorized by the sword as the South was after the war, in grievous taxation, in blighted industries, in gigantic trusts and monopolies, in making classes poor, humbled, and crushed; in farmers and other producers taxed to death and bankrupted; and thus your boasted liberty becomes a mere glittering generality, a tinkling cymbal, a mere reminiscence that ought to bring the blush of shame to your cheek when you recall how in folly and madness you have wasted a precious inheritance. [Great applause.]

I ask that leave be given to any member to print in the RECORD such remarks as he may wish to make on this bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Louisiana [Mr. MEYER] asks unanimous consent for permission for any member to print remarks in the RECORD in reference to this bill. Is there objection?

Mr. STEELE. I object.

Mr. HULL. I call for a vote on this amendment.

The amendment was rejected.

> Insert as a new section the following:
> "SEC. 19. That the provisions as to age prescribed in this act for appointment to the position of judge-advocate, Quartermaster, Commissary, or Pay Department shall not apply to persons who served in the civil war or the late war with Spain: Provided, That the age limit, wherever it appears in this act, shall not apply to persons serving in the Regular Army: And provided further, That officers of the Regular Army shall be eligible to appointment to any of the staff corps of the Army."

Mr. MAHON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk, so as to make the different portions of the bill consistent in regard to the age limit.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, in section 19 as proposed by the committee, the following:
"That the provisions as to age prescribed in this act for appointment to the position of judge-advocate, Quartermaster, Commissary, or Pay Department shall not apply to persons who served in the civil war or the late war with Spain: Provided."

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I wish to offer an amendment to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair would state to the gentleman from Washington that there is an amendment already pending in the second degree. There is an amendment offered to the committee amendment by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. MAHON], and the question now is on that amendment.

The question was taken; and the Chair announced that the "noes" seemed to prevail.

Mr. MAHON. I ask a division. Now, Mr. Chairman, just a moment——

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order under the order of the committee.

Mr. DALZELL. Does this except those persons from its operation who served in the late war? If so, there will be opposition to that feature.

Mr. MAHON (interrupting). This is simply to make the bill conform in all respects to the amendments heretofore adopted.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order; and gentlemen will be in order on the floor of the House.

The question is on the amendment to the amendment, which will be again reported.

The amendment to the amendment was again read.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. MAHON) there were—ayes 110, noes 19.

So the amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The question recurred on the original proposition as amended.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I ask now to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in page 20, line 3, after the word "Regular," the words "and Volunteer;" so as to read "that the officers of the Regular and Volunteer Army shall be eligible," etc.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I want this to apply to the Volunteer Army as well as the Regular Army.

The CHAIRMAN. Debate is not in order.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. LEWIS of Washington) there were—ayes 65, noes 100.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I demand tellers on this proposition.

The CHAIRMAN. The hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the committee will now rise, under the order of the House, and report the bill, with the amendments agreed upon, to the House.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. PAYNE reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union having had under consideration the bill H. R. 11022, the hour of 3 o'clock having arrived, the committee rose, under the order of the House, and reported the bill back with certain amendments, and with one amendment pending, with the recommendation that the amendments agreed to in Committee of the Whole be adopted, and that the bill as so amended be passed.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House to report the bill back with the statement that an amendment was pending. I desire to know if that amendment is before the House?

The SPEAKER. The Chair did not understand the gentleman to make that report.

Mr. BAILEY. That was the report, the Chair will find. The gentleman so reported, and I do not understand by what rule such a report could be made to the House.

This amendment, I think, is not before the House at all.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, at the time the committee rose an amendment, to be inserted in section 19, was before the committee, which amendment—proposed by the Committee on Military Affairs—had two several and separate amendments offered to it—amendments in the second degree. Both of these had been voted upon, one of them having been adopted by the committee, and a vote was being taken upon the other amendment on a division when the time arrived for reporting the bill to the House. Under these circumstances, not knowing the precise terms of the order made by the House, the Chair thought it proper to report the amendment to the House for such disposition as it might deem proper to make.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I correctly understood the Chairman, and make the point of order that the amendment is not before the House for its consideration.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair would say that, inasmuch as the order of the House was to the effect that the vote should be taken at 3 o'clock, and while there is no exact precedent, it seems that in accordance with the practice, as far as the Chair has had an opportunity to examine it, the point made by the gentleman from Texas should be sustained.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, while in Committee of the Whole I stated that I would ask, after we got into the House, that the time for general debate should be extended from 3 o'clock until 4 o'clock, when the vote should be taken upon the bill and all amendments. In pursuance of that suggestion, I now make that request.

I ask unanimous consent, therefore, that the time be extended for one hour, to be equally divided.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that the House shall extend the time at which the vote is to be taken upon the pending bill for one hour. Is there objection?

Mr. HULL. To be divided equally.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa to allow general debate for one hour?

Mr. MAHON. Mr. Speaker, before that consent is given—I do not want to be discourteous to gentlemen, but wish to make merely a suggestion. If gentlemen will agree that the amendments can be voted upon in gross I will not object. We can take up the bill then, after the amendments have been adopted, and after debate, act upon it without delay. We can get through by half past 4 or 5 o'clock.

There are a number of members who have come here under great difficulties—some men who have come here from sick rooms and who are detained here by the debate upon the bill, and who wish to take action as speedily as possible upon it. There are others, a large number of them, I suppose—not less than a hundred, perhaps—who have prepared themselves to address the House upon the bill with a view of enlightening the House and the country, and these speeches are sleeping idly now in their desks. If, however, we can secure a vote upon all of the amendments and then let the vote be taken upon the bill at 4 o'clock, I will not object.

Mr. FITZGERALD. You consumed a lot of time on your side, and you ought not to object.

Mr. BAILEY. I would not ask the House to waive its right to consider each of these amendments upon its own merits in order that I might have the privilege of addressing it, and, so far as I am concerned, I release the gentleman from Iowa from his promise.

Mr. HULL. I withdraw my request, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER. The request is withdrawn.

Mr. HULL. I move the previous question on the bill and amendments, to its final passage.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa moves the previous question on the bill and amendments to its passage.

The previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the amendments.

Mr. HAY. I move to recommit the bill——

The SPEAKER. That is not yet in order. The Chair will recognize the gentleman at the proper time. Is a separate vote demanded on any of the amendments? The Chair hears none. The question is on the amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole.

The amendments adopted by the Committee of the Whole were agreed to.

The SPEAKER. The question is upon the engrossment and third reading of the bill as amended.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I move to recommit the bill, with instructions to the committee to report the substitute which I sent to the Clerk's desk.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia moves to recommit the bill with instructions to the committee to report the substitute, which will be read.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, a parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. Is a motion in order to recommit the bill without instructions.

The SPEAKER. There is a proposition already before the House.

Mr. COX. I know what the proposition is, to recommit the bill with instructions to report the substitute. Now, my proposition is to recommit the bill without instructions.

The SPEAKER. It would be in order to move to strike out the words "with instructions." The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. BAILEY. I demand a division.

The SPEAKER. One moment. The instructions should first be read.

Mr. BAILEY. I understood the Chair to put the question.

The SPEAKER. The Chair put the question, because he supposed it had been read. The Clerk will read the instructions.

Mr. HULL. I ask unanimous consent that the substitute may be considered as read. I think we have all read it and are familiar with it.

Mr. BAILEY. May I inquire, Mr. Speaker, how many pages there are of it?

The SPEAKER. The Chair is informed that there are 19 pages.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I think we can dispense with the reading of it.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. Let a brief statement be made of it.

Mr. HAY. I do not care to have the substitute read. I presume everybody understands what it is.

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suggest that a brief statement of the substitute be made by the gentleman, so as to place the House in full possession of the terms of the substitute.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] has the floor.

Mr. HAY. I do not make any objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa to dispense with the reading of the bill, if I am permitted to make a short statement.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent of the House, the previous question having been ordered.

Mr. HAY. I ask unanimous consent to make a statement of five minutes as to the changes which have been made in the substitute since they were printed in the minority report.

Mr. PAYNE. Is that to be in lieu of reading the bill?

Mr. HAY. Yes.

Mr. PAYNE. If that is coupled with it, I think there will be no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Virginia asks unanimous consent that the reading of the substitute be omitted, and that he be permitted in five minutes to explain to the House the contents of the substitute. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I presume that those who have taken any interest in this debate have looked to the substitute to see what was proposed. The substitute is entirely different and distinct from the bill which has been offered by the majority of the committee. The majority of the committee have reported a bill which provides for 100,000 men as a standing army, and as a permanent standing army, and the minority have reported a bill which only provides for 30,000 men as a standing army, and 50,000 men as volunteers, to be used only in the colonies or in the islands which as yet we have not acquired. These are the clear-cut differences between the bill proposed by the majority of the committee and the bill proposed by the minority.

Now, the substitute also gives this 50,000 men, because they have been demanded by the Executive, by the President of the United States, and the General of the Army as being temporarily necessary to preserve law and order in these colonies which this country has not yet disposed of. These 50,000 men can be enlisted, they can be equipped as cheaply as can the Regular Army, and can be recruited as provided for in the bill of the majority. Moreover, this 50,000 men can go out of service whenever it should be found unnecessary to keep troops in those islands. These are the distinctive features of the bill, one being merely a temporary force and the other a permanent standing army.

Mr. BAILEY. May I inquire of the gentleman from Virginia if it is not true that the substitute also confines these volunteer soldiers to use in those new possessions?

Mr. HAY. Entirely so. Section 20 does that. I do not know that I care to take any further time.

Mr. HULL. I demand the previous question. I beg the gentleman's pardon; I thought he had concluded.

Mr. UNDERWOOD. I desire to ask the gentleman one question. What is the provision as to the term of service of these volunteers?

Mr. HAY. Two years, if not terminated sooner. The enlistment of the Regular Army is three years.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, when will it be in order to move an amendment to the effect to recommit?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa has moved the previous question, and the gentleman from Tennessee desires to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COX. The matter of inquiry is this: The substitute proposes to increase the regular standing army, and it puts it at 30,000 men in the discretion of the President. Now my point is this——

Mr. HAY. I suggest to the gentleman from Tennessee that the substitute does not increase the standing army.

Mr. COX. We have increased the regular standing army in the act that was passed before to 62,000 men, and my point is this——

Mr. CLARDY. A parliamentary inquiry.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee is making a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COX. I am trying to get along with my friends here the very best I can. Now, Mr. Speaker, this substitute makes a proposition to increase the regular standing army to 32,000 men, in the discretion of the President.

Mr. HAY. Will the gentleman allow me to make a suggestion?

Mr. COX. Certainly.

Mr. HAY. This substitute does not propose to increase the standing army one man beyond that allowed by law before the war with Spain. I have the law, and have read it twice to the House.

Mr. COX. It does not make any difference how many times you have read it.

The SPEAKER. Will the gentleman from Tennessee state his parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. COX. It is that you confer upon the President power to call out 32,000 volunteers in an emergency, when it exists. There is where my contest is. We have conferred authority on the President to call out 62,000 men in the Regular Army. Now, then, I make the contest here, that no power ought to be conferred upon the President to call out a volunteer army of 32,000 men; but if you want to reach the point, it is to hold your Regular Army up to 58,000 men.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks that is not a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COX. I am very sorry it is not, but it is a very sensible one.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I desire to make a parliamentary inquiry. When will it be in order to move to recommit with instructions?

The SPEAKER. It will be in order if the House rejects the proposition of the gentleman from Iowa that the previous question be considered as ordered.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I desire to know——

Mr. COX. Let me inquire——

The SPEAKER. The Chair must answer inquiries of other gentlemen. The gentleman from Kentucky makes a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. COX. I do not know that they have any more rights than I have.

The SPEAKER. But they have equal rights.

Mr. COX. No doubt about that.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kentucky.

Mr. COX. My inquiry was to move to recommit without instructions.

Mr. CLARDY. I desire to know if the substitute is authorized to be reported back by the committee, if it is now subject or will be subject to amendment.

The SPEAKER. If it be reported back at all, it will be reported for consideration.

Mr. CLARDY. Can it now be amended?

The SPEAKER. It can not be amended unless the House rejects the demand for the previous question.

The SPEAKER put the question on ordering the previous question.

Mr. McRAE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman desire to submit a parliamentary inquiry?

Mr. McRAE. I do.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. McRAE. I want to ask the Chair if the motion made by the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] should prevail and the substitute be brought back to the House, what would be the question?

The SPEAKER. The question would be on the consideration of the substitute reported by the committee.

Mr. McRAE. And the House might adopt it or reject it?

The SPEAKER. The House might adopt it or reject it. The question is on agreeing to the demand of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] for the previous question.

The question was taken; and the motion was agreed to, and the previous question was ordered.

The SPEAKER. The question now is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] to recommit.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 118, nays 170, answered "present" 9, not voting 54; as follows:

So the bill was passed.

Mr. CLARDY (having voted in the negative). I desire to withdraw my vote and be recorded "present."

Mr. SWANSON. I am paired with the gentleman from Illinois, Mr. LORIMER. If he were present, I should vote "no."

Mr. STEWART of New Jersey. My colleague, Mr. HOWELL, is absent on account of the death of his brother. If he were present, he would vote "aye."

Mr. CARMACK. I wish to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from Missouri, Mr. JOY. If he were here, I should vote "no."

Mr. ALEXANDER. I desire to withdraw my vote. I am paired with the gentleman from New York, Mr. VEHSLAGE, who is sick.

The result of the vote was announced as above stated.

Mr. HULL moved to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed, and also moved that the motion to reconsider be laid on the table.

The latter motion was agreed to.

DIRECTORS OF COLUMBIA HOSPITAL FOR WOMEN.

The SPEAKER announced the appointment of Mr. LIVINGSTON and Mr. BARROWS as directors on the part of the House of Representatives of the Columbia Hospital for Women.

COLUMBIA INSTITUTION FOR THE DEAF AND DUMB.

The SPEAKER also announced the appointment of Mr. RUSSELL and Mr. LANHAM as directors on the part of the House of the Columbia Institution for the Deaf and Dumb.

REPRINT OF ARMY REORGANIZATION BILL.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that a thousand copies of the Army bill as it passed the House be printed and placed in the document room.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa asks unanimous consent that a thousand copies of the bill as it passed the House be printed. Is there objection?

Mr. BARTLETT. I wish to ask the gentleman how they are to be distributed?

Mr. HULL. If they are in the document room, members can get them on application.

Mr. BARTLETT. I ask the gentleman to amend his request so that they may be put to the credit of members in the folding room.

Mr. HULL. If they are placed in the folding room, they are put to the credit of members, and probably one-third of the members will not call for any at all, and the bills will remain there permanently.

Mr. HAY. I hope the gentleman will not object to their being distributed through the folding room. If members do not want to call for them, they need not do so.

Mr. HULL. If they are in the folding room, a large increase in the number will be needed, because a great many copies will never be called for, and members who really desire them will lose the benefit of the number which are not called for. If they are placed in the document room, they can be supplied to members who desire them.

Mr. BAILEY. Will the gentleman from Iowa tell me from whence comes any great demand for copies of a bill like this?

Mr. HULL. A great many members have wanted them.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, of course, members can get them if the bills are put to their credit. Is it not true that the demand comes almost entirely from the Army?

Mr. HULL. No, sir; I have only had calls for six copies from the Army.

Mr. BAILEY. Oh, well, Mr. Speaker, if there is no more demand than that, it looks to me as though it would be useless to print the bill.

Mr. HULL. The newspapers all over the country would like copies of the bill. In my district, at least, they want them, and I have no doubt that a great many other newspapers will want copies.

Mr. BAILEY. Perhaps that is largely because of the gentleman's connection with the bill.

Mr. HULL. Possibly.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, I have no objection. I care nothing about it.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. HAY. I do not want to object: but I ask the gentleman if he will not agree that they be distributed through the folding room?

Mr. HULL. If they go to the folding room, the number ought to be increased largely; but I think a thousand will be ample if they are put in the document room, and will be more than will be called for.

Mr. HAY. I ask the gentleman to request 2,000.

Mr. HULL. If the gentleman insists, I will make the request that 2,000 be printed and put in the folding room.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa for a print of 2,000 copies of the bill, to be placed in the folding room?

There was no objection.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up the bill (H. R. 11487) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, and I move to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a conference.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will report the Senate amendments.

The Senate amendments were read.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. HITT] asks unanimous consent to take up the bill and moves to nonconcur in the Senate amendments and ask for a committee of conference. Is there objection?

There was no objection.

The motion of Mr. HITT was agreed to; and the Speaker appointed as conferees on the part of the House Mr. HITT, Mr. QUIGG, and Mr. DINSMORE.

CAPT. ROBERT W. DOWDY.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 11036) to restore Capt. Robert W. Dowdy to the active list of the Army, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. DINSMORE. Mr. Speaker, I move to concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Senate amendments were concurred in.

GEORGIE SMILEY.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10316) for the relief of Georgie Smiley, with Senate amendments thereto.

EXTENSION OF RHODE ISLAND AVENUE, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to present a conference report on the bill (S. 4571) for the extension of Rhode Island avenue.

The conference report was read.

Mr. CANNON. I want to ask the gentleman from Iowa a question.

Mr. DOCKERY. There does not seem to be any statement accompanying the report.

The SPEAKER. Is there any statement by the House conferees?

Mr. DOCKERY. I make the point that there does not seem to be any statement by the managers on the part of the House.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I will say to my friend that the report is precisely as it came from the Senate.

Mr. DOCKERY. But the rules require a statement from the managers on the part of the House.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri makes the point of order that there is no statement of the managers on the part of the House.

Mr. DOCKERY. I suggest that the matter go over until to-morrow.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the matter go over until to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman can withdraw it. It is a privileged question and can be presented at any time.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I withdraw it.

BRIDGE ACROSS THE MISSOURI RIVER, BOONVILLE, MO.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I believe there is on the Speaker's table a Senate bill (S. 5224) to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Boonville, Mo., by the Boonville and Howard County Bridge Company. A similar bill has been reported by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, and I should like to have the Senate bill considered.

The SPEAKER. That would require unanimous consent, unless there has been some action on the part of the committee.

Mr. BLAND. The committee have reported it favorably.

The SPEAKER. The committee have not called it up; but the Chair will ask unanimous consent after the bill is read.

The bill was read. It provides that section 8 of the act of May 25, 1896, received by the President May 13, entitled "An act to authorize the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River at or near the city of Boonville, Mo.," be, and the same is hereby, amended so as to permit the construction of said bridge to be commenced within one year from May 25, 1899, and the completion thereof within three years from the same date.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The bill was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. BLAND, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

MISSOURI AND KANSAS TELEPHONE COMPANY, OKLAHOMA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the bill (H. R. 10509) to authorize the Missouri and Kansas Telephone Company to construct and maintain lines and offices for general business purposes in the Ponca, Otoe, and Missouria Reservation, in the Territory of Oklahoma, with Senate amendments thereto.

The Senate amendments were read.

Mr. COWHERD. I move that the House concur in the Senate amendments.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the Senate amendments were concurred in.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I desire to call up for consideration the bill (H. R. 11795) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, which bill has been reported from the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. Before making the motion that the House go into Committee of the Whole, I would like to see if we can make an arrangement for the limitation of general debate.

Mr. BAILEY. May I ask the gentleman if he intends to enter upon the general debate this afternoon?

Mr. BURTON. I think not.

Mr. BAILEY. It is now half past 4 o'clock.

Mr. BURTON. I think hardly.

Mr. BAILEY. You think not. Then you will agree with the Democrats on the committee about the division of time?

Mr. BURTON. Now, on the question of the continuance of general debate, I am prepared to agree as to time. I would suggest half an hour. I ask unanimous consent that general debate be limited to half an hour.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that general debate on the bill known as the river and harbor bill bill be limited to half an hour. Is there objection?

Mr. PERKINS. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

Mr. BURTON. Has the gentleman from Iowa any suggestion as to the continuance of general debate?

Mr. PERKINS. I think there ought to be at least an hour.

Mr. BURTON. The bill will be read by paragraphs, and if there is any desire for debate, there will be opportunity as we reach those paragraphs.

Mr. HENDERSON. I suggest one hour.
Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that general debate continue for one hour.
Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask the gentleman how much is carried by this bill?
Mr. BURTON. In all, about thirty millions.
Mr. HEPBURN. And you ask that general debate be closed in one hour?
Mr. BURTON. Twelve millions, approximately, for the year ending June 30, 1900, and $17,000,000, approximately, for deferred contracts to be hereafter provided for.
Mr. HEPBURN. And how much will be carried on the sundry civil bill?
Mr. BURTON. Seventeen millions one hundred and ten thousand of that is to carried on the sundry civil bill. The $30,000,000 is the aggregate amount, under three heads: First, the amount for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, is $12,509,000, and on the deferred contracts authorized to be expended after June 30, 1900, for continuing contracts $17,110,000, and in addition to these two items $770,000 is provided to be expended if certain results are obtained. I now renew the request that general debate be limited to one hour, half an hour on each side.
Mr. HEPBURN. I object.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.
Mr. BURTON. What time will the gentleman from Iowa want?
Mr. HEPBURN. I am not prepared to speak for others, but it seems to me that for a bill that disposes of thirty-odd million dollars, containing as many items, some of them new matters, some of them very questionable, it ought to be debated for longer than half an hour on a side.
Mr. BURTON. I would suggest, as I have already stated to the other gentleman from Iowa, that these items will be reached and read one by one, and on a bill of this length it is not necessary to consume any considerable time, as I said, in general discussion. I will make the request that the time be one hour and thirty minutes—forty-five minutes on each side, and I ask unanimous consent for that.
The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio asks unanimous consent that general debate be limited to one hour and a half. Is there objection? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. BURTON. I now move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering this bill.
Mr. CANNON. I will ask the gentleman if he will not move that the House adjourn now?
The question was put; and the Speaker announced that the ayes seemed to have it.
Several MEMBERS. Division!
Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Did I not understand the gentleman to say that he did not intend to go on with the consideration of the bill to-night?
Mr. HENDERSON. If we adjourn now will it not be the regular order to go into Committee of the Whole?
The SPEAKER. After the House goes into Committee of the Whole the bill, of course, will have to be read.
Mr. BURTON. My only object was that the House should resolve itself into Committee of the Whole and, perhaps, the Chairman be appointed, and then obtain unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with, and after that I should move that the committee rise and that the House adjourn.
The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman insist on the division? [After a pause.] The request for a division is withdrawn; the ayes have it, and the motion to go into Committee of the Whole is agreed to.
The House accordingly resolved itself into the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.
The CHAIRMAN. The House is in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill H. R. 11795, and the Clerk will report the title of the bill.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11795) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.
There was no objection; and it was so ordered.
Mr. BURTON. I now move that the committee rise.
The motion was agreed to.
The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11795, and had come to no resolution thereon.

VIEWS OF MINORITY.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Speaker, I find it impossible to agree with my colleagues in the minority report on the steamship subsidy bill, and I ask unanimous consent that I may be allowed to present views of my own.
The SPEAKER. In what time?
Mr. FITZGERALD. By Thursday night.
The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Massachusetts? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

PORT OF EAST PASCAGOULA, MISS.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the following bill.
Mr. MCEWAN. I reserve the right to object.
The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 11440) to locate the office of the deputy collector of the port of East Pascagoula, Miss., at Scranton, Miss.

Be it enacted etc., That the office of the deputy collector of the port of East Pascagoula, in the Pearl River district of the State of Mississippi, be, and the same is hereby, located at Scranton, Miss.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.
Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, the bill was introduced by the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. MCLAIN]. It simply provides for a change of location in the office of the deputy collector and makes no change in the district itself. It is recommended by the Committee on Ways and Means and also by the Treasury Department.
The bill was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.
On motion of Mr. GROSVENOR, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

By unanimous consent, Mr. SMITH of Kentucky obtained leave to withdraw the papers in the pension case of Z. C. Andrews, accompanying the bill H. R. 3675, there being no adverse report thereon.
Mr. BURTON. I move that the House do now adjourn.
The motion was agreed to.
And accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 47 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

Mr. GALLINGER. I wish in behalf of the Committee to Audit and Control the Contingent Expenses of the Senate to state that we are unanimously of the opinion that it is a bad practice to have clerks appointed in this way paid from the contingent fund, but this is a very urgent case. Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled:

1. That the acquisition by the United States, through conquest, treaty, or otherwise, of territory not adjacent to and geographically part of the continent of North America carries with it no constitutional or moral obligation to admit said territory, or any portion thereof, into the Federal Union as a State or States.

2. That it is against the policy, traditions, and interests of the American people to admit States erected out of such non-American territories, or portions thereof, into our Union of American States, at any time or under any conditions.

3. That the United States accept from Spain the cession of the Philippine Islands with the hope that the people of those islands may demonstrate their capacity to establish and maintain a stable government, capable of enforcing law and order at home and of discharging the international obligations resting on separate and independent states, and with no expectation or desire of permanently holding those islands as colonies or subject provinces, or of compelling their people, against their consent, to submit to the authority of the United States, after they shall demonstrate their capacity for self-government as herein defined, the Government of the United States to be the judge of such capacity.

THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

On motion of Mr. HOAR, it was Ordered, That a series of articles from the Singapore Free Press, relating to the Philippine Islands, be printed as a public document.

OFFICERS IN TEMPORARY SERVICE IN THE NAVY.

Mr. CHANDLER. I submit a resolution for which I ask present consideration.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate how many officers were commissioned and employed in the Volunteer Navy during the late war, how many served in each grade, and how many in each grade are now in the service; and also to send to the Senate a statement giving the names and residences of such officers as had previously served in the Navy and showing the length and character of such service and the present ages of the officers; and also transmitting copies of any applications at any time made from such officers to be admitted into the Regular Navy, and in every such case informing the Senate whether or not the record of the officer was a creditable one during both periods of service.

The Senate, by unanimous consent, proceeded to consider the resolution.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to inquire of the Senator from New Hampshire if the phrase "the Volunteer Navy" be an appropriate, technical, and descriptive phrase? The resolution speaks of service in the Volunteer Navy.

Mr. CHANDLER. I will substitute for the word "Volunteer" the word "temporary;" so that instead of saying "Volunteer Navy" it will read, "temporary service in the Navy during the war with Spain."

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the substitution is made.

Mr. HOAR. I should further like to inquire whether the Senator means to have the Secretary of the Navy give, as to an officer against whom no charges are made or in whose case there has been no formal trial, his opinion as to whether his service was or was not creditable?

Mr. CHANDLER. The officers who are named are expected to be applicants for admission to the Regular Navy, and I can not conceive of any reason why the Secretary should not inform us whether their records are creditable. If the Senator thinks there is, I will strike that clause out.

Mr. HOAR. If they are applicants for admission to the Regular Navy, and if they are appointed, their records and such comments as the Secretary of the Navy may choose to make upon it will come to us, I suppose, in the confidence of executive session. My difficulty is——

Mr. CHANDLER. If the Senator will allow me to interrupt him, I will withdraw that part of the request. I am anxious to get the statistical facts before the Senate as soon as possible.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire proposes a further amendment to the resolution. It will be so modified, in the absence of objection.

Mr. HOAR. I will merely complete my sentence, not to detain the Senate any further. My difficulty lies in the question whether it is quite proper. There might be some officer whose service was not creditable by reason of mental infirmity or illness, or something of that sort. Certainly, I should think that by a general universal demand for the Secretary's opinion as to every officer of a certain class it should not be made public and advertised to the country and put on record forever. I am glad that the Senator has modified the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The question is on agreeing to the resolution as amended.

Mr. SMITH. I desire to have the resolution read.

The resolution as amended was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of the Navy be directed to inform the Senate how many officers were commissioned and employed for temporary service in the Navy during the late war, how many served in each grade, and how many in each grade are now in the service; and also to send to the Senate a statement giving the names and residences of such officers as had previously served in the Navy and showing the length and character of such service and the present ages of the officers; and also transmitting copies of any applications at any time made from such officers to be admitted into the Regular Navy.

The resolution as amended was agreed to.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. RAWLINS. I ask for the reading of the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST].

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate joint resolution No. 191, which will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 191) declaring that under the Constitution of the United States no power is given to the Federal Government to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently as colonies, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That under the Constitution of the United States no power is given to the Federal Government to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently as colonies.

The colonial system of European nations can not be established under our present Constitution, but all territory acquired by the Government, except such small amount as may be necessary for coaling stations, correction of boundaries, and similar governmental purposes, must be acquired and governed with the purpose of ultimately organizing such territory into States suitable for admission into the Union.

Mr. QUAY. I move to substitute for the joint resolution of the Senator from Missouri the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]. The Senator from Utah can proceed on that joint resolution.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President——

Mr. QUAY. Will the Senator from Utah allow me to interrupt him? What is the exact status of the question before the Senate?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST], on which the Senator from Utah has given notice that he will address the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. I thought I made a motion to substitute the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] for the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Utah gave notice that he would make a speech to-day, and also gave notice that it would be on the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri, and the Chair laid that joint resolution before the Senate.

Mr. QUAY. And then the Senator from Pennsylvania moved to substitute the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia. However, it is not a matter of much consequence.

Mr. COCKRELL. I hope that will not be done. My colleague [Mr. VEST] is not here now.

Mr. QUAY. I withdraw the motion.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, the atmosphere just now seems to be clouded with perplexing problems. Everyone, I presume, is imbued with a wish while adhering to justice to do the best he can for his country. Heretofore I have not been opposed to expansion. This nation has been one of growth in population from 3,000,000 to 75,000,000 people, and in territory from the shores of the Atlantic across the continent and out into the swelling waters of the Pacific. Millions of homes of our sturdy and patriotic people and magnificent States have been the fruits of our expansion. Some of us can not afford to cut the limb which supports us between ourselves and the trunk of the tree.

Territorial expansion with commensurate extension of constitutional freedom is twice blessed. It blesses them that give and them that receive. No man can set an artificial barrier to the inevitable progress of the American people. So far our progress has been that of freedom and not of tyranny.

Mr. President, when our fathers christened this Republic they gave it a name which they doubtless deemed sufficient to cover all the exigencies and developments of its future career. That name was the United States of America. We might stretch out to the north and to the south until we encompassed the two continents and all the islands of the Caribbean Sea, and still we might appropriately bear the name which our fathers gave us.

Mr. President, the mere idea of expansion, of extending our borders, does not alarm me so much as some of the startling doctrines advanced in its justification. We are to-day confronted with the question as to whether we shall change the name of the Republic; and if so, what shall the new name be, and what shall it symbolize? Shall it be the United States of America and the Kingdom of the Philippines or shall it be the Empire of America and Asia? Already there are spectral visions of this in the political sky.

It is not necessary, in order to uphold the right and power of this Government to acquire territory, to hold territory, and govern its inhabitants, to maintain that it is an absolute monarchy or an imperial despotism. The right to acquire and hold property is an ordinary one. It belongs to every private individual. It is incident to the existence of every corporation, whether public or private, with the implied limitation that it must be to subserve the objects and purposes of the corporation. This nation possesses that power. No one disputes it. But it is a power not existing independent of and apart from the Constitution, but is derivative from the express authority which that instrument confers upon the Federal Government.

This being an implied power, there are, of course, no express limitations upon it, but there is always the implied one that the territory acquired must be to subserve some of the great objects and ends for which the Government itself was created.

If we should concede for the purposes of the argument that the power to acquire and to hold territory was unlimited, it would by no means follow as an implication from that, or as a correlative proposition, that this nation would have absolute and uncontrolled power over the inhabitants which would thereby become subject to our jurisdiction. The arm of this nation, so potent for purposes of aggression or defense against a foreign foe, becomes impotent the moment it is turned to the oppression of any of our people, whether living in a State or in a Territory.

Mr. President, there have been two schools of political thought in this country. Both, I understand, have agreed that the Constitution is the people's grant of power to the Government of the United States. They have differed only as to the latitude of the construction of the grant. Both alike have agreed that all power not granted according to the one rule of interpretation or the other and not prohibited by the Constitution and its amendments to the States is reserved to the States and to the people. But a new school of constitutional hermeneutics seems to have arisen in the person of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT]. I quote his exact language. He says:

I propose to maintain that the United States is a nation; that as a nation it possesses every sovereign power not reserved in its Constitution to the States or the people.

Mr. President, the power to define and punish crime, a part of the sovereign police power, is nowhere in the Constitution reserved to the States. Therefore, according to the logic of the Senator, the States do not possess that power. The sovereign power of eminent domain is nowhere in the Constitution reserved to the States. Therefore the States do not possess it. The power to create corporations, recognized as the exercise of a sovereign power, is nowhere in the Constitution reserved to the States. Therefore the States do not possess it. So the proposition of the Senator reduces to absurdity.

The Senator from Connecticut affirms that this is a nation; that it is possessed of plenary and absolute power, especially as relates to all its international relations and to the territories which may become subject to its jurisdiction.

Mr. President, what is this thing which the Senator calls a nation, which he so idolizes and exalts? It is not the States or the people. They, according to his proposition, constitute no part of it. They possess only such crumbs of power as may be reserved to them expressly in the Constitution itself.

Is it the President, the Executive, who is the autocratic possessor of this uncontrolled and uncontrollable authority; or are we, the individuals who compose the Congress of the United States, the more than Forty Tyrants whose crown is to be placed upon a long pole with the command that the people as they pass by must fall down and worship it?

Mr. President, it is not in the nature or essence of our institutions, and it is an impossible conception, that this Government, in any part of its internal structure and administration, can be a bald absolutism—a demon of omnipotence—to stalk forth anywhere, either in State or Territory, to oppress or destroy.

It is claimed by the Senator from Connecticut and reiterated by the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] that the Constitution is not operative except within the limits or boundaries of the States, and that it can only be made to extend, and only does extend, to the Territories, under and by virtue of an act of Congress. The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] uses this language:

I believe that the power of the United States in any Territory or possession outside the limits of the States themselves is absolute, with the single exception of the limitation placed upon such outside possessions by the thirteenth amendment. Such, at all events, has been the policy of the United States and its course of action in practice.

Secondly, he says:

Without a legislative act the Constitution does not extend to the Territories or other possessions of the United States outside the limits of the States themselves.

I refer to this in order to make examination of it to see whether there is any proper foundation for these assertions. If it were true that the Constitution of the United States is not operative at all beyond the limits of a State, it proves too much for the purpose of those who assert it. If the moment you step outside of a State the Constitution ceases to be, is a nonentity, is not to be referred to, because it is not a vital and living force there, what follows? The 447 individuals who constitute the Congress of the United States, the man who may occupy the Presidential chair, at once cease to be clothed with any official character or possessed of any power whatsoever. No one of the departments of this Government, either the executive, the judicial, or the legislative, can exercise authority anywhere, either in the States or the Territories, except under and by virtue of the Constitution. Strike away the Constitution and they are emasculated of all authority. They can not take any authoritative step. They would be possessed of no more power than that which pertains to every private individual.

Mr. President, it may be that the Constitution in some of its provisions is not self-executing, but that is no less true in a Territory than in a State. Until Congress has provided for tribunals inferior to the Supreme Court and clothed them with jurisdiction to enforce rights and to redress wrongs, the inhabitants of the State where there has been a violation of any of the fundamental rights secured to them by virtue of the Constitution may be without opportunity or means of redress; it is possible they may be imprisoned often unlawfully, without due process of law, and be without the remedy of the writ of habeas corpus, but in the meantime, until Congress has performed the duty devolved upon it by the Constitution and created such tribunals and clothed them with the necessary jurisdiction, are those rights nonexistent? Certainly not. If they are infringed, it is a violation of right; and if for the time being there is no tribunal competent to grant redress, as soon as such tribunal is created and clothed with the necessary power, the individual whose right is infringed may go into court and seek the form of redress which may then be possible.

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Utah yield to the Senator from Illinois?

Mr. RAWLINS. I yield.

Mr. MASON. Has the Senator discussed at all the statute which covers, or evidently was intended to cover, the suggestion he has been making? Section 1977 of the Revised Statutes provides that—

All persons—

It does not say all citizens, but—

All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other.

Would not that statute extend all the benefits of the Constitution to all persons who are within the jurisdiction of the United States, even though the machinery for giving the constitutional benefit had not been established?

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I am not now considering the question of the necessity or the force of a statute of Congress. I am considering the question as to the scope and operation of the Constitution itself. The proposition I make is that in the States some of the provisions of the Constitution may not be self-executing, but that this is no more the case in the Territories than in the States.

Turning now to the condition in a Territory where the territory is acquired from another government, all municipal laws and regulations in force at the time of the acquisition continue to be in force after that time; that is, until they are superseded by competent legislation, subject, however, to this qualification, that they must be so modified as to conform to the fundamental principles established by the constitution of the Government succeeding to the sovereignty and the public policies which grow out of such principles. That was the rule which was applied with respect to the Louisiana purchase and with respect to the acquisition from Mexico.

During the interregnum, and from the moment the territory is acquired, the Constitution of the United States and all the provisions of that instrument, in so far as they are not essentially unsuited and inapplicable to the condition of a territory, become proprio vigore applicable thereto and control all the municipal laws and regulations which may have been in existence and may have controlled the people up to that time.

Mr. President, it is true that Congress may temporarily delay or refuse to perform its duty of providing a form of government and judicial tribunals in a Territory, as it might refuse to perform its constitutional duty in providing for courts inferior to the Supreme Court within the borders of a State. But we are not to indulge in any presumption that Congress will neglect to perform any duty which devolves upon it under and by virtue of the authority conferred by the Constitution.

Let us proceed one step farther in this matter. There are certain provisions of the Constitution which in their nature are not and can not be made applicable to a Territory. The framers of the Constitution contemplated that the United States would acquire and hold territory, and that such territory would be incorporated into the Union as States upon an equal footing with the original States in due course of time. It was presumed that the Territorial situation would in every instance be but temporary.

Allusion has been made to some decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States and the practice of the Government that the Territorial courts provided for by legislative enactment are not constitutional courts; that they are not courts inferior to the Supreme Court; that the judges of those courts, when appointed, do not hold their offices during life or good behavior. That provision is unsuited to the situation in a Territory, because the framers of the Constitution, as a part of the interpretation of that instrument, contemplated that the Territorial condition would in every instance be temporary. The inferior tribunals referred to were designed to be permanent, and therefore the tenure of the office of the judges appointed was to be during life or good behavior. That provision was unsuited to the condition which the framers of the Constitution contemplated would exist in respect to the Territories.

Mr. President, I have asserted the proposition that no authority can be exercised by any branch or department of this Government in the Territories except under and by virtue of the Constitution. Take away the Constitution, and who is it that possesses this absolute control of the Territories? Is it Congress? But we are met at the very threshold with the question: What is Congress? We have no means of ascertaining its identity or characteristics without referring to the Constitution. How shall it manifest or express its legislative will in respect to the Territories in accordance with the methods prescribed in the Constitution or without any regard to them?

Is it necessary in order to give validity to the attempt to exercise legislative authority, to obtain the concurrence of the Executive; and if so, why, except that the Constitution is in force in respect to that act, and defines and limits and qualifies the power of Congress? If the act of Congress is invalid unless it receives the concurrence of the Executive and is passed in accordance with the forms of procedure which that instrument prescribes, must it not also be in conformity with all other limitations upon the exercise of Congressional authority?

There is one case in the Supreme Court, which arose in the District of Columbia, which is an apt illustration of the contention I am now making. The House of Representatives made an order. Kilbourn refused to obey that order. The House of Representatives passed a resolution directing its Sergeant-at-Arms to arrest and detain Kilbourn for a violation of the order. That order was complied with, and Kilbourn appealed to the court. He claimed that no authority had been conferred upon the House of Representatives by the Constitution to make the original order; that the order was invalid; that all the proceedings based upon it were equally invalid, and that his imprisonment was unlawful. He was discharged upon a writ of habeas corpus. Afterwards Kilbourn sued the Sergeant-at-Arms of the House of Representatives and certain members of that body for damages resulting to him by reason of his unlawful imprisonment, and he recovered a verdict for a very large amount, which was carried to the Supreme Court of the United States, and there affirmed. The unanimous opinion which was delivered in that case is an instructive one.

The court said that the House of Representatives is not possessed with the omnipotent powers of the House of Parliament of Great Britain, but possesses only such powers as have been expressly conferred upon it by the Constitution or such as are necessary to carry into effect the powers which have been granted. The court searched the Constitution and found that the authority which the House of Representatives undertook to exercise in that case did not exist. They therefore held that the imprisonment of Kilbourn was unlawful and that not only the Sergeant at-Arms, the officer of the House, but members of the House aiding and abetting in the unlawful imprisonment were liable for the damages which Kilbourn sustained by reason of his imprisonment.

Mr. President, extend that principle to the two Houses of Congress, include, if you please, the Executive, apply the doctrine to him, and make it applicable to the District of Columbia or to any one of the Territories. Suppose that both Houses of Congress passed an act, duly approved by the President according to the method prescribed in the Constitution, directing the imprisonment of some man anywhere within our national domain who owes us allegiance and who is entitled to the reciprocal benefit of the equal and just protection of our laws and the safeguards of our liberty, and he should be imprisoned in accordance with that act, and the case was brought to our highest tribunal and a search made for the authority conferred upon Congress to make that order, to pass that act, and no such authority was found or implied as incidental to the existence of any authority expressly conferred in that instrument, what would follow?

The liability of those causing the imprisonment, according to the decision of the Supreme Court of the United States, for the damages which that person would suffer. There is one step further. Suppose a person were executed by command of the President without authority derivable anywhere or by any means from our Constitution, would not the President, if such act were defined and recognized in the municipal law applicable to the Territory as such a crime, be guilty of murder?

Mr. President, we can not take one step anywhere within the limits of our national domain as affecting the rights of the meanest of any of the inhabitants dwelling therein owing us allegiance except under and by virtue of the Constitution. No matter how many of the departments participate in that act, they stand upon the footing of mere intruders, marauders, and pirates when they infringe upon the right, the liberty, or the property of the inhabitants anywhere within our national domain unless in the exercise of power which has been conferred upon them by the fundamental law of our land. Therefore I state that to prove that the Constitution is only operative within the States proves too much for the purposes of those who assert it.

Now, as to the proposition that the Constitution can only apply to the Territories if extended there by an act of Congress, that, when we analyze it, presents a most peculiar situation. An act of Congress is an insufficient basis upon which to rest the Constitution. The Constitution can not rest upon an act of Congress, but an act of Congress must rest upon the Constitution, and in every instance must depend for its validity upon the authority which that instrument confers upon Congress to enact it.

What is the proposition, when it is stated in its baldest form, which is presented here to justify the procedure which is proposed in regard to the Philippines by some Senators? The proposition is that the Constitution can not be in force in the Territories except by virtue of an act of Congress. It is equally certain that an act of Congress can not be in force in the Territories except by virtue of the Constitution. In logic that is what is called a vicious circle.

The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE], stating the propositions which he did—namely, that the Constitution had no operative force out of the States and that it could only be made applicable by virtue of an act of Congress—said that such had been the course and practice of this Government. No such precedent and no such practice have been presented to us. Every precedent, whether legislative or judicial, is against the Senator's contention. All my life has been spent in a Territory. For twenty-five years I have practiced law there, and never before did I hear it seriously contended that the safeguards of the Constitution were not a vital and living force anywhere in the Territories. Time and again I have searched the Constitution to find safeguards to protect the rights of my clients, citizens of a Territory, and many cases I have carried to the highest judicial tribunal in this land, and have been able successfully to assert and maintain those rights in that august tribunal.

I say that there never has been an opinion delivered by the Supreme Court, there has never been a hint or suggestion by any judge who has ever occupied a place in that august tribunal from the time of its creation until the present hour, which has ever asserted that the Constitution is not proprio vigore applicable to the Territories, and does not as much safeguard, in those provisions relating to civil and individual rights, the citizens of the Territory as the citizens of the State. Let us see. I am indebted to the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] for one precedent of legislative practice which is, to my mind, exceedingly significant.

The ordinance relating to the Northwest Territory was passed in the year 1787, before the Constitution of the United States was framed and ratified. The Constitution was ratified in 1789. If the Constitution thus adopted and ratified—the prior municipal regulations continuing in force until superseded, according to every principle of public and international law, subject to the qualifications which I have previously stated—if the Constitution of the United States did not become by virtue of its ratification operative in the Northwest Territory, then the ordinance of 1787, although inconsistent with the provisions of that instrument, would have continued in force as it was originally enacted, and there would have been no necessity to change or modify it in order to conform to the limitations and provisions of the Constitution.

On August 7, 1789, the very year in which the Constitution of the United States was ratified, Congress, composed of men who participated in the framing of that instrument, deemed it necessary to pass this act, entitled "An act to provide for the government of the territory northwest of the Ohio River," containing this provision, which I quote:

> Whereas, in order that the ordinance of the United States in Congress assembled for the government of the territory northwest of the river Ohio may continue to have full effect, it is requisite—> that certain provisions should be made so as to adapt the same to the present Constitution of the United States.—Statutes at Large, volume 1, pages 50-53.

No such act solemnly passed as that could have been passed by the men who participated in framing and adopting the Constitution of our country, unless they believed that that instrument and all its provisions not utterly unsuited to the condition of a Territory would be proprio vigore applicable thereto, and it would be necessary to make any legislation previously enacted or subsequently enacted conform to the provisions of that instrument. Whatever may have been done after that is immaterial, especially by those who did not participate in the framing of that instrument. This is a cotemporaneous declaration, an interpretation of the Constitution, and asserting the fact that that instrument was originally intended to apply to the Territories and not to be confined in its operations within the limits of the States. There is nothing in Congressional legislation subsequent to that time which is inconsistent with the interpretation to which I have now alluded.

Turn to the Supreme Court, Mr. President. At this point I may be pardoned if I briefly allude to the decisions from the first, constituting a part of the history of that tribunal and all its declarations from the beginning until now on this question. In 4 Wheaton (Loughborough vs. Blake) Chief Justice Marshall, delivering the opinion of the court, said:

> The eighth section of the first article gives to Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" for the purposes thereinafter mentioned. This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all places over which the Government extends. If this could be doubted, the doubt is removed by the subsequent words, which modify the grant. These words are, "but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States." It will not be contended that the modification of the power extends to places to which the power itself does not extend.
> The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises may be exercised, and must be exercised, throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole or any particular portion of the American empire? Certainly this question can admit of but one answer. It is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than the other. Since, then, the power to lay and collect taxes, which includes direct taxes, is obviously coextensive with the power to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises, and since the latter extends throughout the United States, it follows that the power to impose direct taxes also extends throughout the United States.

I next call attention to the case of Webster vs. Reid (11 Howard, page 460), which arose in the Territory of Iowa. The defendant in error, Reid, recovered judgment against Webster for a quarter section of land. The validity of the judgment depended upon the regularity of proceedings under a statute of said Territory. The judgment in favor of Reid was held invalid by the Supreme Court. In this case Justice McLean said:

> By the seventh article of the amendments of the Constitution it is declared: "In suits at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed $20 the right of trial by jury shall be preserved." * * * The [Territorial] act under which the above proceeding was had prohibited the trial by jury in matters of fact in which the suits were founded. In this respect the act was void.

In the case of Reynolds vs. The United States (98 U. S., 162), which arose in the Territory of Utah, Reynolds claimed that his religious rights had been infringed in his conviction. In the opinion of the Supreme Court in this case Chief Justice Waite uses this language:

> Congress can not pass a law for the government of the Territories which shall prohibit the free exercise of religion. The first amendment to the Constitution expressly forbids such legislation. Religious freedom is guaranteed everywhere throughout the United States so far as Congressional legislation is concerned.

Mr. GEAR. Is that the Iowa case?

Mr. RAWLINS. No.

Mr. GEAR. I thought the Senator was quoting the Iowa case.

Mr. TELLER. I did not want to interrupt the Senator until he was through with that case, but I now ask if that is not the Utah case?

Mr. RAWLINS. Yes.

Mr. TELLER. I want to call attention to the fact that Congress in 1850, in the act to establish a Territorial government for Utah, used this language:

> That the Constitution and laws of the United States are hereby extended over and declared to be in force in said Territory of Utah so far as the same or any provision thereof may be applicable.

Mr. RAWLINS. I was not unaware of that, Mr. President. There has been in most of the organic acts pertaining to the Territories such a provision. That proves nothing against the contention which I have made. It simply discloses that the Congresses which passed these acts, if there was any doubt upon the question—as there had been some expressions by such men as Daniel Webster and others in Congress, but never by the Supreme Court of the United States—that the Constitution was applicable to a Territory, desired, so far as they had the power to do so, to remove that doubt. It was an indication of the sentiment which had its inception at the time of the adoption of the Constitution and which has continued down to the present, that if there was or could be any doubt upon that ground, Congress intended, so far as possible, to remove that doubt; but that is no argument that it was not in the minds of the framers of the Constitution that the safeguards of that instrument should be equally applicable to the Territories as to the States.

Mr. TELLER. I should like to say to the Senator that if he can cite any debate in Congress previous to 1828 where there was a suggestion that the Constitution of the United States went by its own force into the Territories, I shall be very much obliged to him; but I am sure it can not be found.

Mr. RAWLINS. Mr. President, I have already cited an act passed August 7, 1789.

Mr. TELLER. That was for the purpose of giving to those people the benefit of the Constitution.

Mr. RAWLINS. I interpret that act according to its language. The men who framed the Constitution said it was necessary, in order that that act might be enforced in the Territories, to make it conform to the Constitution. That was the substance of their declaration.

Mr. TELLER. Yes; but it was to provide that the governor of the Territory, instead of reporting to the Confederation, should report to Congress. That is not an argument in favor of what the Senator suggests, for subsequent to that time, by several statutes, they extended the Constitution into the new Territories.

Mr. RAWLINS. Well, I shall submit the language itself for its own interpretation. I do not think it can be made clearer by anything that either the Senator or I can say about it.

Mr. President, I next refer to the case of Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S. Reports, page 44). Justice Matthews, in delivering the opinion of the court in that case, said:

> The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them, as to other citizens, by the principles of constitutional liberty which restrain all the agencies of Government, State and national. Their political rights are franchises which they hold as prvileges in the legislative discretion of the Congress of the United States.

It is true that the Constitution does not impart political privileges, the franchise of voting, or holding office to the inhabitants of a Territory, not because it is not applicable to the Territory, but because that instrument does not impart such rights anywhere, either in a State or in a Territory, as held by the Supreme Court of the United States in the case of Minor vs. Happersett, 21 Wallace.

Mr. President, Ex parte Neilsen (131 U. S.) is an interesting case. Neilsen sought relief by the writ of habeas corpus from second trial and punishment for the same offense of which he had been previously convicted. Mr. Justice Bradley delivered the opinion of the court. I desire to call attention to the fact that this opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Bradley, because some Senators have asserted that that distinguished judge in another case made an intimation that the Constitution was not in force in or applicable to a Territory. This distinguished judge in this case used this language, page 183:

> In the present case the ground for the habeas corpus was not the invalidity of an act of Congress under which the defendant was indicted, but a second prosecution and trial of the same offense contrary to an express provision of the Constitution. In other words, the constitutional immunity of the defendant was violated by the second trial and judgment.

A similar case is that of Ex parte Snow, reported in 120 U. S., 274, in which the opinion was delivered by Mr. Justice Blatchford.

In the case of the Mormon Church vs. United States (136 U. S., 44) Justice Bradley, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

> Doubtless Congress in legislating for the Territories would be subject to those fundamental limitations in favor of personal rights which are found in the Constitution and amendments, etc.

In Callan vs. Wilson (127 U. S., 540), which arose in the District of Columbia, it was held that the people of the District can not be deprived of any of the constitutional guarantees of life, liberty, and property.

> We can not think—

Said the Supreme Court—

> that the people of this District have in that regard less rights than those accorded to the people of the Territories of the United States.

In American Publishing Company vs. Fisher (166 U. S., 464) it was held that in the Territory of Utah parties to a suit at common law where the value in controversy shall exceed $20 can not be denied the right of a unanimous verdict of twelve men under the seventh amendment of the Constitution.

In Springville vs. Thomas (166 U. S., 707), a later decision than the above, and involving the same question, in which it was elaborately contended by counsel that the provisions of the Constitution were not applicable to the Territories, Chief Justice Fuller in delivering the opinion of the court uses this language, to which I invite the attention of Senators:

> In our opinion the seventh amendment secured unanimity in finding a verdict as an essential feature of a trial by jury in common-law cases, and the act of Congress could not impart the power to change the constitutional rule, and could not be construed as attempting to do so.

Mr. President, if the Constitution applicable to a Territory depends upon the legislative act of Congress, it has not the dignity of the Constitution, but stands upon the level of the act of Congress itself, and is subject to change, modification, or repeal; and the Supreme Court, referring to the numerous cases which had previously been before that tribunal, expressly here declared, in the very latest decision, that Congress can not impart validity to any act which will deprive the inhabitants of a Territory of the right of trial by jury as provided in the Constitution.

In Thompson vs. The State of Utah (170 U. S., 346) the question was whether under the provision of the Constitution forbidding Congress to pass any bill of attainder or ex post facto law the right of trial by jury of twelve men to which the defendant was entitled in the Territory of Utah at the time when the offense charged was committed could be subsequently taken away by an act authorizing his trial by a jury composed of only eight men. The Supreme Court held not. Justice Harlan, in delivering the opinion of the court, says:

> That the provisions of the Constitution of the United States relating to the right of trial by jury in suits at common law apply to the Territories of the United States is no longer an open question.

Further, the court say:

> When Thompson's crime was committed (in the Territory) it was his constitutional right to demand that his liberty should not be taken from him except by the joint action of the court and the unanimous verdict of a jury of twelve persons. To hold that a State could deprive him of his liberty by the concurrent action of a court and eight jurors would recognize the power of the State not only to do what the United States in respect of Thompson's crime could not at any time have done by legislation, but to take from the accused a substantial right belonging to him when the offense was committed.

There is a distinct and unequivocal declaration that Congress could not, at any time, take from one charged with crime in a Territory, at any time during the Territorial condition, or deprive him of that constitutional right. Such are the precedents.

Mr. President, there is another phase of this question. If it is possible to establish anything by repeated decisions of the highest tribunal of this land, if it is possible to prove any proposition, which by logic and reasoning amounts to a demonstration, it must follow that the Constitution, in all the provisions of that instrument not unsuited to the condition in a Territory, there safeguards all the rights of all the inhabitants of the Territory owing allegiance to this Government, as much as it safeguards the corresponding rights of the people of the States.

There is another interesting case to which I desire to call the attention of the Senate. It occurred in troublous times, when men were feverish and restive under constitutional restraints, as some of them seem to be to-day. During the trouble between the States Milligan, in the State of Indiana, was arrested and arraigned before a military tribunal, and was denied the right of due process of law or the intervention of a jury before he could be found guilty of the offense with which he was charged. They were proceeding post haste to execute him, illustrative of the fact in contravention of what the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said the other day, that the American people are under all circumstances too just ever to commit a wrong. They were proceeding to execute him without any authority whatever, and the supreme tribunal was appealed to to prevent that crime from being committed.

The Supreme Court discharged him. They held that as to a State or Territory in which there was no invasion or rebellion and as to a person not a prisoner of war and not in the military or naval service Congress could not clothe a military commission with the power to try and convict and execute him; and as the same provisions which safeguarded Milligan in the State of Indiana [illegible]ly equally everywhere within the limits of our dominion where the jurisdiction of our Government extends, under the limitations and the qualifications of the Constitution, the same principles which were applicable to Milligan and Indiana will be equally applicable under like circumstances to the Philippine Islands if we retain them. But there is some language in this opinion which I desire to quote.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. May I interrupt the Senator from Utah?

Mr. RAWLINS. Certainly.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Where, under the Constitution, is it provided that a person who is properly tried before a court-martial is not entitled to a trial by jury? I suppose the reason why a citizen of the United States is not entitled to trial by jury by a court-martial is because the Constitution says that Congress may make laws for the government of the Army and Navy just as it says it may make all needful rules and regulations for the government of territory.

Mr. RAWLINS. If I had plenty of time, I should like to read this opinion by the Supreme Court, delivered by Chief Justice Davis. I refer to the Milligan case, 4 Wallace. It shows why we can not do the one thing as to a person not in the military or naval service in a district or State where there is no invasion and no rebellion and why we can do it under a different set of circumstances as to a person who is a prisoner of war or who is in the military or naval service, and therefore subject to military discipline and military law.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But courts-martial in time of war try persons who are not in the military service; try citizens of the United States who are not soldiers, who have not enlisted, who have not signed the Articles of War, and try them without a jury, and because and only because, as I understand it, the Constitution provides that Congress may make rules for the regulation of the Army and Navy for their government, the same as it provides that Congress may make rules for the government of territory.

Mr. RAWLINS. I can not oppose my own feeble authority against that of the distinguished Senator from Connecticut, but I do feel confidence in interposing the authority of the Supreme Court of the United States. I read what they say upon the subject, quoting from the syllabus.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator from Utah will find——

Mr. RAWLINS. Will the Senator from Connecticut permit me to complete my sentence? The court says:

Military commissions organized during the late civil war in a State not invaded and not engaged in rebellion, in which the Federal courts were open and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their judicial functions, had no jurisdiction to try, convict, or sentence for any criminal offense a citizen who was neither a resident of a rebellious State, nor a prisoner of war, nor a person in the military or naval service. And Congress can not impart such authority.

That language is free from ambiguity.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. The Senator will find, if he reads the opinion, that Justice Davis puts the right to try a citizen of the United States by court-martial without jury upon the clause in the Constitution to which I have referred.

Mr. RAWLINS. Of course, I am aware of that proposition. I quote this language from the opinion:

Time has proven the discernment of our ancestors, for even these provisions—

That is, the safeguards of the Constitution—

expressed in such plain English words, that it would seem the ingenuity of man could not evade them, are now, after the lapse of more than seventy years, sought to be avoided. Those great and good men foresaw that troublous times would arise, when rulers and people would become restive under restraint and seek by sharp and decisive measures to accomplish ends deemed just and proper, and that the principles of constitutional liberty would be in peril unless established by irrepealable law. The history of the world had taught them that what was done in the past might be attempted in the future. The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men, at all times and under all circumstances.

Mr. President, it will be an evil day for this country when those principles thus solemnly announced become untrue. That is a sufficient answer to the remarks made by the junior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] and reiterated by the Senator from New York [Mr. PLATT], that whenever the Constitution stands in the way of accomplishing any temporary expedient or purpose which may be thought proper in the frenzy of a temporary majority, the Constitution is to be turned to one side. Ah, if it is not to be turned to one side, perhaps they would change it without going through the tedious and difficult formalities prescribed in that instrument for its own amendment.

The cases to which I have alluded are monuments of the fact that arbitrary power possessed by whomsoever anywhere will be abused. It has been abused in England time and time again by every sovereign who claimed to be clothed with an uncontrollable will with respect to the liberties and properties of his subjects. Time and time again I have seen it abused within the limits of the United States. In the Snow case they tried to convict him time and time again and punish him for one and the same offense, contrary to the provisions that for the same public offense no man shall twice be put in jeopardy, etc. The Reynolds case, the Neilsen case, the Snow case, the Milligan case, and the multitude of cases which have gone to the Supreme Court, carried there by those claiming the safeguards of our Constitution, and which have been reversed by that tribunal for their violation, plainly disclose that it is unsafe ever to break down the barriers to the exercise of arbitrary power.

Mr. President, it would be useless for me to undertake by further reference to authorities to establish the proposition which I started out to maintain: First, that the Constitution proprio vigore applies to the Territories, the remotest Territory within our jurisdiction, and is there a vital and living force, never to be overridden by any edict of any Executive, by any command of any military leader, or by the concurrent action of all the departments of this Government. I think it is clear that an act of Congress which must rest for its validity upon the Constitution can not give the Constitution any force anywhere which it would not otherwise possess.

But let us apply these principles briefly to the situation which now immediately confronts us in the light of some claims which are put forth here by distinguished Senators. One of these is that we will so adjust and make unequal our revenue and tariff laws as that the sugar and hemp, the products of the inhabitants of the Philippine Archipelago, will not be permitted to come into competition with the like products of the American farmer.

If we may do that, we can pass similar legislation in order to prevent the wheat grown in Oklahoma from coming into competition with the wheat grown in Kansas or other States of the American Union. Is it possible that there is vested anywhere in this Government power to make such discrimination as that against inhabitants and citizens owing allegiance to this Government and entitled to the reciprocal benefits of its equal and just laws—such infamous discrimination between a citizen of Oklahoma and one in the State of Kansas or in any other State? Or may we prevent the competition of mineral products of New Mexico and Arizona with the similar products of Colorado and Utah? If so, we are to override the interpretation of the Constitution as made by John Marshall and which has prevailed without question from that moment to this. Therefore we can not, unless we override the barriers of the Constitution, shut out the products of the meanest of our citizens owing allegiance, whoever they may be, whether upon the continent or an island of the sea 10,000 miles from the seat of government.

Mr. President, another contention is made in respect to the dark inhabitants of those distant islands. It is that we, not as a punishment for any crime of which they have been duly convicted in accordance with the safeguards and provisions of the Constitution, may deny them the privilege of coming from their homes into the States or visiting the capital of the country to which they owe allegiance. If it is possible to do that, Mr. President, is it not also possible for us to say to the inhabitants of a State, "You may not emigrate to a Territory?" If we may do that, we may forbid those people from passing from one island to another; and if we may do that, we may forbid them visiting their neighbor's house; and if we can do that, not as a punishment for any crime of which they have been duly convicted, may we not throw them down into that Spanish dungeon described by Senators, there to await the incoming tide to end their troubles and put them beyond the reach of American tyranny?

Mr. President, what do we want the Philippine Islands for? Do we want them to furnish homes for our own people? No. Do we want them to furnish an outlet for our surplus labor? The sturdy American workingman could not live in that climate, competing with the meanest of the Tagalos. Do we want them to add a wholesome element to our population, that our sons may find wives and our daughters husbands? The blighting curse of the Almighty would rest upon such miscegenation. Do we want them in order to practice upon their inhabitants the same arts of philanthropy which, applied to the aboriginal inhabitants of this continent, have led to their extermination? Humanity says no. Do we want them for the sake of their trade and commerce? Already the spokesmen of the dominant Administration are seeking to devise unconstitutional methods for intercepting and preventing such traffic. Do we want them in order to send hither swarms of officeholders, carpetbaggers, to riot among them like slimy worms, eating out their substance? Ah! there is the rub. But for this, this perplexing problem would not to-day be seriously confronting the American people. No, there is no conceivable good which they can bring to us. Their retention bodes nothing but evil. They are made the pretext for emasculating our freedom, for overriding our Constitution and breaking down the safeguards of our liberty.

Mr. President, it is said that we must keep the islands to discharge some humane duty or moral obligation. What is it? Those people rendered us aid, it is said; that Aguinaldo and his chieftains and some of his followers rendered us aid in the capture of Manila. We with our Army and Navy rendered them aid in their warfare against Spain. Suppose we set off our obligations against theirs, balance the account, and let it go at that? That will be satisfactory to them; it ought to be satisfactory to us.

Mr. President, I have had great difficulty in respect to the question which is soon to come before the Senate for a vote—the ratification of the peace treaty. I and the American people want to end this war. There is no reason why it should be protracted another moment.

But some of us are confronted with another suggestion made by the Senator from Montana, hinted at by other Senators, suggested from sources which would seem to be authoritative, deriving their strength as they come emanating from the Executive authority of this nation. What is it? While the armistice with Spain is pending, while the Filipinos owe allegiance to the Spanish Kingdom, we are not in a position where we can discharge our obligations to them with shot and shell, not directed against the Spaniard, but against our former ally; that we must get rid of this treaty and end that situation, so that our guns, once directed toward Spain, may be turned upon them; and what for?

Is the ratification of the treaty to end one war to be the inception of another, the end of which no man can foresee, and against people who are absolutely guiltless in sin as against us, who have expressed their gratitude for the aid which we have rendered them—guilty of no crime under the sun except the desire and aspiration which moved our ancestors, the desire and aspiration to be free? Ah, Mr. President, that is the condition, and it is a serious problem, and I confess that while I should like to end one war, I do not want that to be the inception of another under those circumstances and without any excuse or justification under the sun.

Mr. President, there have been many undulations in the strange and wonderful career of humanity. The glory of Egypt was eclipsed in the progress and development of the barbarous tribes of Greece. The plowshare coursed through the site of ruined Carthage, once the proud mistress of the seas and presiding over the destinies of commerce. The northern barbarian, overrun by the legions of Rome, afterwards wore the purple and occupied the imperial throne. There is a descending as well as a rising scale in the life of nations. A decadence may set in. No people, however proud or strong, need flatter themselves that they are beyond the reach of vicissitude. Though they be, like the Ethiopians of old, the favorite associates of the gods, they may descend to the abasement and turpitude of slaves. We can not afford to go even halfway down to the Asiatic level in order to proportionately uplift their civilization. We have enacted laws which stand like cherubim with flaming sword at the gateways of the Republic to drive back the hordes of the dark and degenerate races of the East, lest they may enter in to infect and to degrade us.

Whatever may happen, Mr. President, let it be that the fathers who erected this Republic "reared a monument more enduring than brass, higher than the regal structure of pyramids, which may not be destroyed by the corroding storm, the fury of the northern wind, by an innumerable series of years or the flight of time." The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] twitted the Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] with seeing constitutional obstacles, lions in the pathway leading to the House Beautiful. Would the Senator from Connecticut have us, like Samson of old, destroy the lion at the gate in order that we might enter in to wed the daughter of the Philistine? It behooves us to take warning by that example, lest we, too, by such "benevolent assimilation," have our locks shorn and the strength of our institutions taken away.

Mr. BACON. I move that the Senate take up for consideration and action Senate joint resolution (S. R. 211) relative to the acquisition of foreign territory.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MASON in the chair). The Senator from Georgia moves that the Senate take up for action Senate joint resolution No. 211. The question is on agreeing to that motion.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. What is the motion?

The PRESIDING OFFICER. That the Senate proceed to the consideration of Senate joint resolution No. 211.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. That is all right.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, resumed the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I trust it may be——

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The pending question is on the motion of the Senator from New Hampshire [Mr. CHANDLER] to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. QUAY. I sincerely trust that the Senator from New Hampshire who made the motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations will withdraw that motion and allow the question to come to a direct vote on the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I think I am entitled to the floor. I addressed the Chair.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia was recognized.

Mr. QUAY. I was speaking, I understood, with the indulgence of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Georgia was so unfortunate as not to be able to hear the Senator from Pennsylvania.

Mr. QUAY. I was asking the Senator from New Hampshire to withdraw his motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations, and to allow a direct vote on the joint resolution of the Senator from Georgia with an amendment that I suppose will be suggested.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from Mississippi?

Mr. BACON. Certainly.

Mr. QUAY. I desire to call the attention of the Senator from New Hampshire to my suggestion. He seems to be engaged in conversation with the chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I desire to submit an amendment before a vote is taken upon this question. I wish to make a motion to amend the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. BACON. The Senator from Mississippi desires to make that motion to amend before I proceed?

Mr. SULLIVAN. No; I do not care to interrupt the Senator now.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I trust it may be consistent with the will of the Senate that we may have a vote on the joint resolution. Those of us who favor the joint resolution have but one way in which to manifest that favor, and that is by voting for its passage. Those who oppose the joint resolution have several ways in which they may compass its defeat.

It of course will be recognized by the Senate that the joint resolution, to be of any effect, must be speedily acted upon. Therefore those who favor a postponement and who vote for a postponement are virtually voting against the joint resolution. Those who vote for a reference of it to the Committee on Foreign Relations well know that that will be the practical defeat of the joint resolution. Therefore those who vote in favor of such reference must be understood to mean that they are opposed to the passage of the joint resolution.

I trust that the suggestion of the Senator from Pennsylvania may be recognized as a proper one by the Senator from New Hampshire, that these dilatory motions may be abandoned, and that we may come squarely up to the mark and let those of us who favor the joint resolution vote for it and those who are opposed to it enter their votes in the negative directly against the proposition.

Mr. QUAY. I repeat my suggestion to the Senator from New Hampshire that he withdraw his motion to refer.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President——

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Georgia yield to the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. BACON. I do, sir.

Mr. CHANDLER. Mr. President, it has been my impression since talking with the Senator from Georgia on yesterday that I had better withdraw the motion to refer in order to allow amendments to be made and voted on. I do not admit, the Senator from Georgia will allow me to say, that this is a dilatory motion. I had felt that if all these resolutions were referred to the Committee on Foreign Relations that committee might meet and make a report immediately. I know they could do so if they chose. I had, therefore, no dilatory purpose nor any desire to delay action upon the joint resolution any longer than was necessary to a proper conduct of the public business.

I will withdraw the motion, Mr. President, but I will say to the Senator from Georgia that I hope he will not ask for a vote at this time. I shall not myself oppose fixing a time when a vote may be taken upon the joint resolution.

Mr. BACON. What time will suit the Senator from New Hampshire?

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask unanimous consent to withdraw the motion to refer.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire asks unanimous consent to withdraw his motion to refer the joint resolution to the Committee on Foreign Relations. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the motion is withdrawn.

Mr. BACON. Now, as I understand, the question is upon placing the joint resolution on its passage. The Senator from New Hampshire asks that a vote upon it be not asked for now. I do not know of any good reason (of course I am ready to recognize any which may be suggested) why there should be a postponement. The joint resolution has been before the Senate since the 11th day of January. It has itself been directly discussed, and kindred resolutions and subjects have also been discussed every day from then until now. I presume what I said yesterday is true, that there is no Senator who has not made up his mind how he is going to vote on the joint resolution. Therefore, there can be no reason which occurs to me—there may be some to be suggested—why there should be a postponement. From day to day, Mr. President, I have asked for the consideration of the joint resolution.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. If the Senator from Minnesota will pardon me just a moment—I say from day to day I have asked for the consideration of the joint resolution, and each day, as is well known to the Senate, until the hour of 2, when there could be no action, there has been a consumption of time and the Senate has been prevented from coming to a vote upon it. Now I will hear the Senator from Minnesota.

Mr. DAVIS. So far as I am authorized to speak there is no objection to a vote upon the joint resolution now. There has been no dilatory intention in anything which has been done.

Mr. BACON. I am very much obliged to the Senator from Minnesota; and I trust that we may have a vote upon the joint resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution (S. R. 211) relative to the acquisition of foreign territory is before the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, and open to amendment.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I move to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert what I send to the desk.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Mississippi moves to strike out all after the resolving clause and to insert what will be read by the Secretary.

The SECRETARY. Strike out all after the resolving clause and insert:

That the ratification of the pending treaty of peace with Spain shall in no wise determine the policy to be pursued by the United States in regard to the Philippines, nor shall it commit this Government to a colonial policy; nor is it intended to embarrass the establishment of a stable, independent government by the people of those islands whenever conditions make such a proceeding hopeful of successful and desirable results.

Mr. GEAR. I ask that the original joint resolution may be read.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Senate joint resolution 211 will be read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, First. That the Government and people of the United States have not waged the recent war with Spain for conquest and for the acquisition of foreign territory, but solely for the purposes set forth in the resolutions of Congress making the declaration of said war, the acquisition of such small tracts of land or harbors as may be necessary for governmental purposes being not deemed inconsistent with the same.

Second. That in demanding and in receiving the cession of the Philippine Islands it is not the purpose of the Government of the United States to secure and maintain permanent dominion over the same as a part of the territory of the United States, or to incorporate the inhabitants thereof as citizens of the United States, or to hold said inhabitants as vassals or subjects of this Government.

Third. That whereas, at the time of the declaration of war by the United States against Spain, and prior thereto, the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands were actively engaged in a war with Spain to achieve their independence; and whereas said purpose and the military operations thereunder have not been abandoned, but are still being actively prosecuted thereunder, therefore, in recognition of, and in obedience to, the vital principle announced in the great Declaration that governments derive "their just powers from the consent of the governed," the Government of the United States recognizes that the people of the Philippine Islands of a right ought to be free and independent; that with this view, and to give effect to the same, the Government of the United States has required the Government of Spain to relinquish its authority and government in the Philippine Islands and to withdraw its land and naval forces from the Philippine Islands and from the waters thereof.

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaim any disposition or intention to exercise permanent sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said islands, and assert their determination, when a stable and independent government shall have been erected therein entitled to recognition as such, to transfer to said government, upon terms which shall be reasonable and just, all rights secured under the cession by Spain, and to thereupon leave the government and control of the islands to their people.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, as it is evident that we can not complete the vote before 2 o'clock, I ask that there may be unanimous-consent that the regular order at that hour be laid aside in order that we may complete the vote upon the joint resolution, and the amendments offered thereto.

Mr. PASCO. I ask if that would not be in violation of the other unanimous-consent agreement which was made some time ago?

Mr. BACON. In order to avoid any complication of that kind—I do not wish in any manner to trench upon the unanimous-consent agreement—at the suggestion of Senators I will ask unanimous consent that to-morrow, at 1 o'clock, we may take a vote upon the pending joint resolution, and any amendments now pending or that may then be offered.

Mr. DAVIS. At what hour?

Mr. BACON. At 1 o'clock.

Mr. LODGE. I ask what is the regular order?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The pending question is the amendment offered by the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. SULLIVAN].

Mr. ALLISON. Mr. President, I merely wish to suggest to the Senator from Georgia that on to-morrow the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER] desires to make some observations upon all these resolutions, and I would not now, in his absence, like to give unanimous consent to a proposition which would cut him off in the midst of his remarks.

Mr. BACON. I will suggest 12.30 as the time for a vote. Then we will get through in time.

Mr. FAULKNER. I suggest to the Senator from Iowa that under the unanimous-consent agreement with reference to an executive session at 2 o'clock, we could fix it at 12.30 and the Senator from Wisconsin could take the floor after the vote on the joint resolution. Then when the hour of 2 o'clock arrives he has a right, under the original unanimous-consent agreement, to continue to hold the floor until his speech is completed.

Mr. ALLISON. Of course I do not wish to interfere with any understanding that may be reached now, but the Senator from Wisconsin intended to address himself to the pending joint resolution.

Mr. LINDSAY. There are plenty of others pending.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. The Senator from Wisconsin proposes to discuss Senate joint resolution 191.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well, Mr. President. I only make the statement. If Senators wish to take action now in his absence, I shall not interpose.

Mr. BACON. I will modify my request to this extent: I ask consent that to-morrow, upon the completion of the morning business, the Senate may proceed without further debate to vote upon the joint resolution and pending amendments and other amendments then or theretofore offered.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that immediately after the completion of the routine business to-morrow morning the pending joint resolution and all amendments already offered and that may be hereafter offered shall be voted upon.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. Without further debate.

Mr. DAVIS. I suppose it is unanimously understood that the unanimous-consent agreement now asked and that asked to be made a few moments ago, that we should waive the 2 o'clock hour, does not and shall not interfere with the arrangement to go into executive session at 2 o'clock?

Mr. GORMAN. Of course not.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is no proposition to interfere with the unanimous-consent agreement in regard to 2 o'clock.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia?

Mr. CARTER. I suggest that the Senator from Georgia modify his request so that the vote may be taken immediately after the conclusion of the remarks of the Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], which will be offered in the Senate to-morrow morning in pursuance of the notice heretofore given.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That would run past 2 o'clock.

Mr. BACON. It would run past 2 o'clock, and that could not be done without interfering with the unanimous-consent agreement.

Mr. ALLISON. Then I ask unanimous consent further that the Senate convene at 11 o'clock to-morrow. That would give us ample time.

Mr. COCKRELL and others. No, no.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. There is no occasion for that.

Mr. ALLISON. Very well. I have tried to accommodate Senators.

Mr. CHANDLER. The Senator from Georgia can now ask unanimous consent that if the voting is not completed at 2 o'clock the existing agreement which operates at that hour may be dispensed with for that day.

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. That ought not to be done.

Mr. GORMAN and others. No, no.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I ask for the consent agreement as I have indicated it.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Georgia asks unanimous consent that immediately after the completion of the routine business to-morrow morning the joint resolution and all pending amendments and amendments then offered shall be voted upon without further debate. Is there objection?

Mr. TILLMAN. That is the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON]?

Mr. JONES of Arkansas. It is.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Is there objection?

Mr. CARTER. Mr. President, it is not my purpose to prevent a vote by the Senate on the joint resolution if it is the manifest desire of the Senate to vote upon it, but I do think, first, that the present arrangement being made might well be the subject of consideration for twenty-four hours. I think, second, that it is discourteous to the Senator from Wisconsin in his absence to make a unanimous-consent agreement whereby the matter to which he proposes to address his remarks will be swept from the Senate and therefore can no longer be pending for the purpose he announced. Unless some arrangement can be made whereby the Senator from Wisconsin may address himself to the pending joint resolution in its present condition, I shall feel constrained to object, and I hope the Senator from Georgia will modify his request so as to permit this simple act of courtesy to a Senator now absent from the Chamber.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

Mr. DAVIS. I ask that the unfinished business be temporarily laid aside.

Mr. QUAY. Mr. President, in respect of what the Senator from Montana [Mr. CARTER] has said, I think there will be no difficulty at all as to the Senate indulging the Senator from Wisconsin, to whom we all listen with great pleasure, to extend the remarks which he desires to make to-morrow. As I understand it, the Senator from Montana bases his objection entirely upon the question of the extension of Senatorial courtesy to the Senator from Wisconsin. I trust he will withdraw his objection.

Mr. CARTER. Not entirely, Mr. President. I expressly stated that in my opinion the space of twenty-four hours would not be an excessive length of time to be allowed for the consideration of this very important question.

Mr. DAVIS. Mr. President——

Mr. CARTER. I make that suggestion, not thereby intending to be understood as being opposed to a vote upon these propositions, if it shall be the desire of the Senate to proceed to a vote at any reasonable time in the future. The proposition is not made nor the suggestions put forth for the purpose of consuming time or preventing a vote.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. There is objection to the request of the Senator from Georgia.

Mr. DAVIS. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Will the Senator from Minnesota allow the Chair to clear the table of certain important matters upon it?

Mr. DAVIS. Certainly.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 11440) to locate the office of the deputy collector of the port of East Pascagoula, Miss., at Scranton, Miss., was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Commerce.

REORGANIZATION OF THE ARMY.

The bill (H. R. 11022) for the reorganization of the Army of the United States, and for other purposes, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Military Affairs.

Mr. HAWLEY. I move that 1,000 additional copies of the bill may be printed for the use of the Senate, to be placed in the document room. We have no copies of it.

The motion was agreed to.

REPORT OF METROPOLITAN RAILROAD COMPANY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the annual report of the Metropolitan Railroad Company of the District of Columbia, for the year ended December 31, 1898; which was referred to the Committee on the District of Columbia, and ordered to be printed.

PRESIDENTIAL APPROVAL.

A message from the President of the United States, by Mr. O. L. PRUDEN, one of his secretaries, announced that the President had on January 31 approved and signed the act (S. 4626) to change the proceedings for admission to the Government Hospital for the Insane in certain cases, and for other purposes.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. DAVIS. I renew my motion.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Minnesota moves that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours and fifteen minutes spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 20 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until to-morrow, Thursday, February 2, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to; accordingly the House resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair, for the further consideration of the bill (H. R. 11795), making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask, before proceeding with the bill, whether the opponents have united upon any one to control the time of those opposing it?

Mr. BROSIUS. Nobody seems to be ambitious for that function.

Mr. BURTON. If not, I will proceed in the remarks I have to make.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I would suggest to the gentleman from Ohio that the probability is there is no one here that is opposed to the bill, but there may be opposition to certain items in it, and the chairman can recognize such members.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, this country is entering upon an era of commercial expansion. The vast amount of our exports, as well as their excess over our imports, is a marvel to the commercial world. To take advantage of this situation, to reap its full benefits, nothing is more urgent than the improvement of our rivers and harbors so that the products of the farm, the forest, the mine, and the factory may be carried to the sea, and then loaded into ships in deep-water harbors to be taken to other portions of the world. The question arises how shall this work be done, for we must realize that not to go forward is to go backward.

As I pointed out in some remarks made in this House in April, 1896, two distinct methods have been employed for the improvement of rivers and harbors. The first is to leave their improvement to the municipalities most interested and to private enterprise. The second is to have the General Government undertake this task. The best illustrations of these different methods will be found in the lines of policy adopted by Great Britain and by France. In Great Britain the first method is employed. Enormous improvements have been made on the Tyne, the Mersey, the Clyde, and the Thames, that on the Tyne alone costing $20,000,000, and the others much more, the money being supplied by private companies and by municipalities. In the scope of these enterprises is included not only improvements in channels, but also the construction of wharves and docks.

The other method is that employed in France. The General Government undertakes the improvement of rivers and harbors. From the year 1814 until the present time France has expended $300,000,000 in the improvement of harbors and rivers and the construction of canals—two and a half times as much as the total amount expended in this country for similar purposes, the amount expended in this country being about $320,000,000. This is true, notwithstanding the fact that the Republic of France is not equal in area to a single State of this Union—the State of Texas. Between these two methods we must choose; between these two methods we have chosen. For three-quarters of a century the General Government has undertaken the improvement of rivers and harbors, and I make bold to say that no appropriations made by the United States Government have conferred so general a benefit upon the people of the United States.

The committee in the consideration of this bill have had presented to them recommendations for projects for the improvement of rivers and harbors aggregating $200,000,000; yet the amount carried in this bill is a little in excess of $30,000,000. The appropriations for different years are briefly explained in the report filed with the bill. In view of the great disparity between the amount appropriated ($30,000,000) and the total amount recommended ($200,000,000) it will appear that our task has been one of selection. We have rejected five-sixths and appropriated for one-sixth. In framing the bill the committee have endeavored to follow certain principles. The committee have sought to make provision for increased improvements where commerce now exists rather than to undertake new projects where the benefit conferred would be problematical or where the expense would be out of proportion to the probable benefit.

Second. We have thought it best, so far as possible, to push projects to completion and to avoid piecemeal appropriations. Even if there were a number of projects before us of equal importance, it seems best to select one and complete that, rather than make dribbling appropriations, the results of which would not be beneficial and the amounts for which would not be expended economically.

We have also omitted from the bill provisions for improvements, whether now under way or recently proposed, where it did not seem to us that the benefits conferred would be in due proportion to the amount required. I will cite several illustrations. The local engineer recommended for the Upper Missouri River, for the 1,660 miles above the lower limits of Sioux City, $717,000. We have omitted entirely to make appropriation for this portion of the river in accordance with this recommendation, making only an appropriation of $50,000 for snagging purposes. This river is divided into four reaches, and the total commerce does not exceed, according to official statistics, 20,000 tons.

The greatest demand for appropriation is for so-called harbors at different points on this river. The committee have been unable to see the propriety of expending large amounts for harbors where navigation does not exist.

The committee have omitted provision for the lower portions of the Coosa River, from the East Tennessee, Virginia and Georgia Railroad bridge to the mouth. The total amount required to complete this improvement would be $4,683,000, calling for the construction of 23 locks and dams. The engineer reports that it is useless to proceed with this improvement unless large amounts are furnished for immediate use, and we are unable to see that the amount required would result in corresponding benefit.

The local engineer recommended for the Tennessee River $2,065,000 for the ensuing year. We have appropriated $165,000—$100,000 for that portion of the river between Riverton, Ala., and the mouth, a distance of 226 miles, and $30,000 for that portion between Chattanooga and Knoxville, 188 miles, on which there is some independent commerce; and we have provided $35,000 for a resurvey of that portion between Chattanooga and Riverton, a distance of 259 miles.

Mr. COX. Do I understand that for the part of the Tennessee River between Riverton and the mouth of the river the committee recommend an appropriation of $100,000?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. COX. And the distinct purpose is that the amount to be applied between Riverton and the mouth of the river shall be $100,000?

Mr. BURTON. That is the provision.

Mr. COX. That seems to me perfectly satisfactory.

Mr. BURTON. We have divided the river into three portions—the portion just referred to by the gentleman, between Riverton and the mouth of the river, for which we propose to appropriate $100,000; next the 259 miles from Riverton to Chattanooga, for which we propose an appropriation of $35,000 for surveys and for essential maintenance, and for the upper 188 miles, from Chattanooga to Knoxville, we propose to appropriate $30,000.

In regard to the middle portion, from Chattanooga to Riverton, I will state that according to the estimate $5,000,000 will be required for the completion of that improvement. The commerce—and boats can float upon it now for the major part of the year—was barely 200,000 tons during the last year for which reports have been made. The local engineer in a communication to the committee states that $5,000,000 will not, in his judgment, be sufficient to complete the improvement; that $1,130,000 additional, making over $6,000,000, will be required for the locks and dams and other improvements necessary to make this part of the river navigable the year round.

At the Muscle Shoals Canal 5,119 tons of freight were carried through, having a value of $88,000, at an expense to the Government of $68,000 for care and maintenance, it thus appearing that an amount equal to three-fourths of the value of the freight carried through was required for care and maintenance.

Mr. HEPBURN. Will the gentleman state how much we have expended upon that improvement in past years?

Mr. BURTON. I am unable to state the amount precisely. It is between three and four million dollars, as I recollect.

Mr. HEPBURN. And what did the gentleman say the commerce amounted to?

Mr. BURTON. Something over 200,000 tons in that portion of the river.

The committee thought it best to have a resurvey of this portion of the river, it appearing, I may say, that for a part of it—that portion between Bridgeport and Decatur—no survey has ever been made. It appears further that this river has been, until within a few years, under the control of three different engineers, so that no plan involving the improvement of the whole river has ever been made by one engineer. When that survey is made, with a report of the probable cost of the improvement, Congress can then more intelligently decide what to do with the central portion of the river.

We have appropriated for the Cumberland River $200,000; $100,000 to be used at the Harpeth Shoals, below Nashville, and the other $100,000 in the completion of locks and dams now under way, which might be destroyed but for the additional expenditure for their entire or partial completion.

Mr. COX. I beg the gentleman's pardon for interrupting him, but I wish to call his attention to the particular improvement of which he has just been speaking with reference to these rivers, both of them being in my district, one on either side of it.

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the gentleman from Tennessee with pleasure.

Mr. COX. What do I understand the gentleman to state as the amount of the appropriation for Harpeth Shoals?

Mr. BURTON. One hundred thousand dollars.

Mr. COX. And what was it during the preceding year?

Mr. BURTON. I am not able to state at this time.

Mr. CATCHINGS. If the gentleman will permit me——

Mr. BURTON (continuing). But the upper portion of the river was improved under a continuing contract, providing for the construction of several locks and dams. I am informed now, however, in response to the inquiry of the gentleman from Tennessee, that the last bill carried $80,000 for its improvement; that is, the bill of 1896.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I was just about to make that statement to the gentleman.

Mr. COX. And the appropriation of $80,000 was expended on the Harpeth Shoals?

Mr. BURTON. All of it, or nearly all. Substantially the whole amount.

Between Nashville and the head of the Cumberland River—nearly 357 miles—about $7,000,000, or in the neighborhood of that sum, will be required for the construction of 29 dams, and other improvements to the river to complete the improvement, under the plan proposed. The committee recommend an appropriation of $100,000, deeming that to be the whole amount that we were justified in making at the present time, in view of the amounts carried by the bill, and, on the other hand, they believed this appropriation should be made, because of the amount necessary for the uncompleted locks and dams already in course of construction.

The committee thought it best to pursue a general policy with reference to all of these improvements, the necessity for which has been illustrated in the case of these two rivers especially, namely, to make the improvements beginning at the mouth of the streams and continuing gradually upward to the source. As a legacy coming to us from preceding Congresses we find that on the Cumberland River appropriations have been made for entirely different portions of the stream not connected at all with each other; but as many appropriations appear to have been made as there were Congressional districts bordering upon the stream itself.

We did not think that policy should be pursued, and have not recommended it in the pending bill. We think it better to adopt the other policy, and improve first the mouth of the river under ordinary circumstances, except where there may appear reasonable grounds for pursuing an exceptional course, such, for instance, as exceptional commerce on the upper part of the river and very little at its mouth, or for the sake of securing a greater depth of water on the upper part, so as to afford through navigation on all, as is illustrated in one of the appropriations made by this bill; or, again, where there are quarries of stone or other material on the upper waters of the river, that can be utilized for construction of locks and dams, or otherwise in a continuous improvement of the whole stream.

As has been stated already, the amount appropriated in the bill available for the 1st day of July, 1900, is $12,509,000. Seven hundred and seventy thousand dollars is appropriated to be expended in the event that certain results are accomplished. A large portion of this will not become payable or a burden upon the Treasury until after June 30, 1900. The committee have under consideration a proposition to strike out $320,000 of the $770,000 to which I have just referred. There is also an authorization for appropriations in the future, under the continuing-contract system, of $17,110,000.

The committee have made provision for but one continuing contract, in which the amount to be expended hereafter exceeds $1,000,000, and that is for the improvement of New York Harbor from the Narrows to the open sea. A project has been recommended for a continuous channel of 10 miles in length that requires dredging for about 6¼ miles to a depth of 35 feet and a width of 2,000 feet.

The only apparent exception to the system adopted by the committee—and it is only an apparent exception—is that we provide for two dams on the Ohio River, each carrying an expenditure of $850,000, $50,000 of which is to be appropriated this year and $800,000 provided hereafter. It should be said, however, in this connection, that these are nearly 100 miles apart on the river, though both of them are part of the general improvement of the stream.

I wish to state, Mr. Chairman, that we have endeavored to consult all interests in the make-up of this bill. We have endeavored to extend to the different portions of the country precisely the same treatment, without partiality, and to follow the same principles in dealing with all of these improvements. At the same time we have endeavored to decide upon each of these projects on its own merits. We could in a bill of this character have included improvements which would have involved an expenditure of $60,000,000 or more.

But after careful and thorough consideration of all the questions and of all of the interests involved we have limited the bill to the amount named. And I wish to ask the House not to insist on making amendments or additions to this measure, which is symmetrical so far as it goes. If further amounts are placed upon it, they will interfere with its harmony, and there would be injustice to the localities now included if their appropriations were not proportionally increased.

I do not say that it is free from imperfections. The committee, however, in the limited time given to them, and in view of the great amount of details brought before them, have tried to bring in the best possible bill, and we submit it to the House for its favorable consideration. [Applause.]

I reserve the balance of my time.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. BURTON. From what I understand, I suppose the time occupied by the gentleman from Iowa should be taken from the time of those opposed to the bill or criticising it.

Mr. HEPBURN. If my friend [Mr. PERKINS] may be recognized in his own time, then he can use so much of it as he chooses and yield the remainder to others.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that an hour and a half has been agreed upon for general debate, to be equally divided.

Mr. PERKINS. I think no arrangement was made with reference to the division of the time. So far as I am personally concerned——

Mr. BURTON. I think we should have an arrangement in regard to that. It is possible those who favor the bill may not occupy all their time.

Mr. PERKINS. So far as I am personally concerned, I am willing that the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in charge of the bill should control all the time.

Mr. BURTON. Then I ask that the gentleman from Iowa have a portion of the forty-five minutes given to those opposing the bill or criticising it. How much time does the gentleman desire?

Mr. PERKINS. Not over ten or fifteen minutes.

Mr. BURTON. Will ten minutes answer?

Mr. PERKINS. Yes.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from Iowa?

Mr. BURTON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Iowa, to be counted from the forty-five minutes allowed to those opposed to the bill.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, the request has already been made by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] in charge of this measure that no amendments other than those offered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors be considered by the House. Nevertheless I desire to submit a criticism to this bill, and to appeal to the House for its correction in the particular that I shall undertake to point out.

As the gentleman has already stated, no provision is made in this bill for any appropriation for what we know as the Upper Missouri River, except the appropriation for $50,000 for snagging. He has stated as his reason for denying appropriations for this portion of the river that it is without commerce. And yet on a river without commerce we have the recommendation of the committee for an appropriation of $50,000 for snagging. If the position of the committee is consistent, it hardly seems to me proper to appropriate $50,000 for snagging on a stream on which there is no commerce.

Mr. Chairman, the Missouri River is, in connection with the Mississippi, the longest river in the world. For many years it was the only means of connection with that vast northern territory, before the days of the construction of railways. I admit that now the commerce on the river has been materially reduced by reason of railroad competition, and yet the river is a constant check upon railroad rates. I have before me the report of the Board of Engineers, and it seems that only the year before this report was made, a boat constructed at Sioux City was put on the river to operate between that city and Wheeler County, S. Dak., to give the farmers of that section an outlet for their crops, against the exactions of the railway companies.

A MEMBER. How far is that?

Mr. PERKINS. About 200 miles.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it has been the policy of Congress for many years to improve the Missouri River. The reach of the river from the mouth of it to the lower limits of Sioux City is under the jurisdiction of the Missouri River Commission. From the lower limits of Sioux City to Stubbs Ferry, Montana, is under the jurisdiction of the War Department, and has been cared for from year to year by the engineers detailed from that Department. In my city is located the office of the engineer in charge of this part of the river. The ice harbor, containing the boats of the Government operating upon the river, is located there.

I find that about six pages of this report are devoted to the work on the Missouri River, and the Board of Engineers make this recommendation:

At South Sioux City.—The Nebraska bank of the Missouri River in front of South Sioux City had been protected for about 4,000 feet upstream from the lower bridge and for about 5,400 feet upstream from the upper bridge, by revetments constructed by the owners of the respective bridges. Between these two revetments about 4,270 linear feet of bank was unprotected and was being rapidly eroded. The present project, adopted July 24, 1896, contemplates the expenditure of the funds provided by the river and harbor act of June 3, 1896, in revetting this unprotected bank, in repaving the upper bank for 300 feet farther upstream, and in protecting the head of the work by a short pile dike. The project contemplated the expenditure of $50,000, but as it was believed that the work could be done for the $40,000 allotted, no modification of the project was made. The work forms part of a general plan, described under the next heading, for the improvement of the river in this vicinity.

To June 30, 1897, there had been expended $35,674.36. The work had been completed. Its results had been the stopping of the erosion on the formerly unprotected portion of the town front.

The expenditures during the year have been $4,080.48. A combined pile driver and hydraulic grader and four skiffs have been constructed, and a towboat purchased, part of its cost being paid from the allotment for work at Yankton. The plant is intended for use in the lower part of the district as may be required.

The work at South Sioux City remains in good condition, and has protected the front.

At Sioux City.—The river above Sioux City was extremely unstable, several cut-offs had occurred in recent years, causing radical changes in channel, increased slope, and a large amount of erosion on banks opposite Sioux City. For the purpose of checking this erosion, work was begun in 1878 and continued in each succeeding year until 1882. The works constructed were of an experimental type, and have since been destroyed or abandoned by the river.

In 1889 a group of 9 dikes was built at the center of the Sioux City front to check a dangerous erosion and fair out the bank line. In 1895, 2 dikes were built just above this group and 2 dikes of the group strengthened. In the same year, under a project for the expenditure of $40,000 appropriated by the sundry civil act of March 2, 1895, a group of 10 short dikes had been built near the upper limits of the city to protect the bank there. This latter work formed part of a general plan submitted at the same time for the rectification of the river from about 2½ miles above the mouth of the Big Sioux River to near the lower limits of the city, at an estimated cost for the portion below the Big Sioux River only, of $400,000.

The present project, adopted June 10, 1897, for the expenditure of the $40,000 allotted from the appropriation of June 3, 1896, provides for protecting the lower portion of the city front (below the Floyd River), for making necessary repairs to existing dikes, and for applying the balance to such work as may afterwards be found necessary. The project is a modification of one adopted February 10, 1897, the change having been rendered necessary by marked changes of channel in the spring of 1897. A project providing for the expenditure of $50,000, adopted July 24, 1896, had been superseded by the latter.

To June 30, 1897, $202,250.97 had been expended in this locality.

Under the projects of July 24, 1896, and February 10, 1897, four barges had been built, the dikes near the upper limits of the city had been partially repaired, considerable construction material purchased, and two surveys of the reach made.

The expenditures during the year have been $18,698.97. The Iowa bank has been protected by revetment for 824 feet next below the Floyd River, below which 20 short dikes have been built, and shore protection and foot mattress for 3 other dikes constructed. The mattress for 1 of the latter is an extension of the revetment. It is thought from present conditions that their completion may prove unnecessary, the mattress laid being a sufficient protection to the bank. By the revetment and dikes the front has been protected for about 7,400 linear feet. The works are in good condition and have thus far fulfilled their purpose.

Ice harbors.—Few good natural ice harbors exist on that portion of the Missouri River known as the "Sandy River," between Carroll, Mont., and Sioux City. The adopted project provides for the construction of two ice harbors, which were afterwards located at Rockhaven, near Mandan, N. Dak., and on the Big Sioux River (upper limits of Sioux City) near its confluence with the Missouri.

The total expenditures to June 30, 1897, were $42,694.19, by which the two ice harbors had been completed.

The expenditures during the year have been $68.50. A well has been driven at the Sioux Ice Harbor for the use of the watchmen and of the force employed on plant repairs. The ice harbors are in good condition as regards shore work, but the removal of bars in their front and at the mouth of the Big Sioux River is frequently necessary to make them accessible.

River survey.—Prior to the adoption of the present project a survey of the entire river, comprising secondary triangulation, levels, topography, and hydrography, had been begun by the Missouri River Commission. Between Fort Benton, Mont., and Sioux City the triangulation had been completed, the primary levels run from Fort Benton to Trover Point, Mont., 232 miles, and topography and hydrography completed from Fort Benton to Coal Banks, Mont., 41 miles.

The present project, adopted December 20, 1890, provides for completion of the survey between Fort Benton and Sioux City, with the publication of maps. The expenditures on the project to June 30, 1897, were $139,250.58. The survey had been completed and mapped, and a set of lithographed detail maps, covering the river valley from Fort Benton to Sioux City, had been published.

The expenditures during the year have been $106.20, mostly for freight liabilities of former years. Examinations were made at Fort Benton, Mont., and Judith, Mont., and the water gauges at Wolf Point, Mont., and Fort Buford, N. Dak., the reading of which had been discontinued, were stored.

The total expenditures on the Missouri River between Stubbs Ferry and Sioux City to June 30, 1897, except for snagging, were about $1,204,685.32. In addition, about $10,000 was expended on the general river survey above Stubbs Ferry.

It is understood to be the intention of Congress to continue improvements at Bismarck, Pierre (both sides), Yankton, Elkpoint, and Sioux City (both sides); and for the purpose of economical work at those localities an estimate of $250,000 is submitted, with recommendation that the allotment of this amount be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

* * * * * * *

New lines of transportation were established during the fiscal year 1897. The gasoline boat Iowa, of 48 tons, was launched at Sioux City in the fall of 1897, and has since been engaged in the trade between Sioux City and Wheeler, S. Dak., 188 miles.

The steamer Capitola Butt, of 57 tons, formerly engaged in ferriage at Sioux City, was sold in the summer of 1897, and has since plied between Chamberlain, S. Dak., and Lower Brule Agency, S. Dak., 5 miles.

Now, I want to say that no recommendation in the Engineer's report before the Rivers and Harbors Committee was in more distinct recognition of an improvement than this. I think that work was begun as far back as 1872, though no material work was done until 1889, and in each river and harbor bill since I have been here, beginning with the administration of my friend from Mississippi, General CATCHINGS, in the Fifty-second Congress, at least a small appropriation has been made for the protection of the river at these vital points.

At Sioux City, a city of 40,000 population, under the policy of Congress, great improvements have been made down to the bank of the Missouri River. Relying upon the continuation of the policy of Congress to control that stream, we have two great bridges across the river at that point, costing a million and a quarter and a million and a half. A railroad system runs along this levee. We have our warehouses, going down to the bank of the river. Vast interests are involved in the protection of the stream at this point. This bill, as I understand, is framed for the protection of commerce.

Is the commerce passing back and forth from Iowa to Nebraska not to be considered? Is the commerce along the bank of that stream not to be considered? They say it is for the protection of private property. What is a sloop upon the lakes but private property? What is a boat upon one of these rivers but private property? And why not for the protection of the commerce of such a city as I represent, for that at Yankton, for that at Pierre, and for that at Bismarck? Here is this great artery running from the extreme of our northern boundary to the Gulf of Mexico, always available to commerce, always available as a check against the rapacity of railroad corporations. Is nothing to be done to keep this artery open? I can see no distinction involved here, and it has been the policy of Congress to continue this work.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. PERKINS. Now, Mr. Chairman, without asking an extension of my time, I do request that I may have the privilege of extending my remarks in the RECORD by quoting from the report of the Board of Engineers; and I simply want to add that at the proper time, if I can be recognized, I want to submit the following amendment:

Amend, after line 20, page 67, by inserting the following:
"To continue improvements at Bismarck, Pierre (both sides), Yankton, Elk Point, and Sioux City (both sides), $300,000, the allotment of this amount to be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War."

That is a modest appropriation for this great reach of the river of more than 1,600 miles, and it will be as modest a request as any presented in this bill or that will be presented on the floor. Will the Chairman please submit my request?

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request of the gentleman from Iowa will be granted. [After a pause.] The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. BURTON. I yield ten minutes to the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], to come out of the time of the opponents of the bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would like to ask whether the gentleman in favor of the bill can hold the floor on all the discussion of the bill? It seems to me that this is a modest procedure, but one that I have not known of before.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Iowa that the division of time thus far has gone on the understanding that it was by general consent. The rule adopted is that the time shall be equally divided; and there being no provision for the control of the time, it is within the province of the Chair to control that time. And the Chair will state that if there is no gentleman who proposes to control the time in opposition, irrespective of the gentleman in charge of the bill, the Chair will, without objection, recognize the gentleman in charge of the bill to control one-half of the time.

Mr. HEPBURN. I would be glad to be recognized by the Chair for a few moments in opposition to the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, it was not an arrangement of my own seeking. I have twice asked the committee if those opposed to the bill could agree as to who should control the time, but no one uttered a word; and I understood it to be acquiesced in that the time shall be controlled by me on both sides. I will say to the gentleman from Iowa that I will yield to him any reasonable time, even if necessary to be taken from the time of those who favor the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. If nobody wants to take the control of the time in opposition to the bill, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Iowa be permitted to control the time against it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know who wants to oppose the bill. There is no such concert and harmony of action of interest and purpose on the part of those who oppose the bill as there is in those in favor of the bill, and therefore we can not get together so quickly, and I am not prepared to say who is opposed to the bill.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I should like my request submitted.

Mr. BURTON. I would ask that the gentleman from Tennessee be given the ten minutes that I yielded to him.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will recognize the gentleman from Tennessee for ten minutes, and will then recognize the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. BANKHEAD. I think we had better have some definite understanding as to how this time is to be controlled. As I understand the Chair, he proposes to recognize the gentleman from Iowa in his own time. In that case, I desire to ask if the gentleman from Iowa, being recognized in his own time, would not be entitled to control an hour?

The CHAIRMAN. He could not control an hour, because there is not an hour's time at the disposition of the committee.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, it is not my purpose to enter into a general discussion of the subject of internal improvement, neither am I seeking to discuss the merits of the whole subject-matter of this bill, nor the disparity of appropriations granted, but to direct the attention of the House to that portion of the bill which deals with one division of the improvements on the Tennessee River. At the proper time I shall offer to the House an amendment which provides for the making of plans and estimates for the construction of locks and dams and works between Chattanooga and Shellmound, through that portion of the river known as the Suck, or mountain section, and also a survey of the Hiawassee River.

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors has kindly consented to recognize these amendments as committee amendments, and with perhaps some slight amendment to the amendment by the chairman of the committee, who will offer the same. There is only a meager appropriation for the river between Chattanooga and Riverton. At the proper time I shall propose an amendment to increase the same. I presume it is hardly necessary to call the attention of the House of Representatives to the fact that the Tennessee River has been recognized by the Congress of the United States as a great waterway entitled to the aid of Congress for a period now of more than seventy years.

Nor is it necessary that we go into details of the value of the commerce to the people of the several States of the Union interested in the improvement of this river. But in view of the statements made on the floor as to the reason why the appropriations were not made, it may not be improper that I call the attention of the House to a few of the reasons why this river is entitled to recognition and liberal appropriation on the part of Congress. The Tennessee River is a navigable river for several months during the year for a distance of about 1,400 miles for steamboats, and has an additional navigation for barges of 1,050 miles. It has 30 tributaries, with 1,382½ miles of navigable water for steamboats and barges.

In 1896 there were 64 steamers on the river, with a net tonnage of 10,000; 240 barges, with a carrying capacity of 80,000 tons; passengers carried, 115,574; tons of freight, 1,908,042; value of freight, $22,493,000. This was the commerce of the river with the obstructions in it, which, if removed, would be increased tenfold. I make this general and incomplete statement in reference to the river not for the purpose of inducing a change in the report of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors as to the whole of the river, because I recognize the fact that in view of the revenue condition of the country it was proper that small appropriations should be made all over the country for rivers and harbors; and I am prepared to concede, so far as the river between Knoxville and Chattanooga is concerned, that in accordance with the views of the engineers the provision made by that committee for that particular section is not unfair, although I personally regard it as unjust. I am prepared to concede further that the appropriation for the section between Riverton and the mouth of the river is not unjust in view of the present condition.

In consideration of the statements made by the engineer in charge, that a million and a half dollars might be saved by changing the plans at the shoals, I can not disapprove the action of the committee in declining to make appropriation for that improvement at this particular time, for it will take more than $2,000,000 to complete the work.

Mr. COX. Where is that?

Mr. MOON. At the Colbert and Muscle Shoals. The committee in making this report to the House reached its conclusions alone upon the report of the engineers. The engineers recommended some $300,000 between Chattanooga and Riverton.

I am not now insisting that this report should be changed from $35,000, allowed in the bill for that section of the river, to $300,000; but looking to the position assumed by the committee, that they should and would follow the direction of the engineers, reducing the estimates in proportion to the necessity of the work, and conceding, for argument only, that the appropriation for other portions of the river between Knoxville and Chattanooga and Riverton and the mouth of the river are correct and justified by the engineers' advice upon the same doctrine, this committee is estopped from denying and refusing to follow the engineers' advice as to that portion of the river between Chattanooga and Riverton in determining the amount of the appropriation. Their views should be controlled by the engineers' report, as the engineers alone are possessed of proper knowledge of the work and estimates. The United States engineers in charge inform us that $300,000 is needed now, and that $100,000 is absolutely necessary in this particular section to protect the work, the plant, machinery, etc., of the United States used in improvements between Chattanooga and Riverton.

The engineer insists that $35,000 is not sufficient for that purpose and that we should have, in order to keep up the plant and the work, at least $100,000, and that an appropriation of a smaller sum would practically be a loss to the Government. Therefore, I shall move to amend by raising this sum to $100,000, in accordance with the views of the engineers, and in accordance with the policy adopted by the committee in making this report, which they ought not now to repudiate.

Mr. COX. Will my colleague yield for a moment?

Mr. MOON. I can not just now. I desire, Mr. Chairman, to read the statement of the engineer in charge. He enters into general discussion of the river improvement, the necessity for this great work, and concedes that the bill is fair in many of its parts, and that the appropriation, while not that which is desired, is perhaps just, in view of the other appropriations in the bill. The engineer says:

TENNESSEE RIVER IMPROVEMENT,
ENGINEER OFFICE, U. S. ARMY,
Chattanooga, Tenn., January 23, 1899.

MY DEAR SIR: * * * A copy of the river and harbor bill as reported is now before me, and, while the total amount appropriated is disappointingly small, yet when we compare the appropriations for the Tennessee with those granted elsewhere, it would seem that all portions of the river and the tributaries were fairly treated except that portion between Chattanooga and Riverton. This portion is about 226 miles in length.

The section immediately below Chattanooga is known as the mountain section and, although it has been surveyed in the past, no complete and satisfactory project for its improvement has ever been prepared. It has been my desire, and I think it is the desire of the people of Chattanooga generally, that this portion of the river should be improved by a lock and dam placed near the outlet from the mountains. As this plan has never been considered by Congress, we could hardly hope for an appropriation to carry it into execution. About the best we could expect was an authority to resurvey it and to prepare a project. This the present bill allows and is, I think, so far satisfactory.

From the outlet of the mountains down to a few miles below Decatur the river has never been surveyed at all, and while no obstacles of great magnitude exist, yet there are a large number of small ones which seriously interfere with low-water navigation. The bill provides for a survey of this portion of the river, and when it is accomplished we shall know what improvements are necessary and how much they will cost. This is also satisfactory.

From the head of Browns Island, a few miles below Decatur, down to Florence is a stretch of river which has been sufficiently surveyed and extensively improved, for it includes the Elk River and the Big Muscle Shoals. It also includes the Little Muscle Shoals, which have not yet received the proposed improvement. A plan exists and has received the sanction of Congress for improving these shoals by a canal and two locks at an estimated cost of a million and a half dollars. No money has yet been applied to this improvement, because it was thought best not to begin the improvement until the work at Colbert Shoals, which is lower down on the river, had been completed, but if for any reason it is thought best to suspend for a time the work at Colbert Shoals, there is no reason why we should not proceed with the improvement of Little Muscle Shoals, and any amount up to a million dollars which Congress might see fit to appropriate could advantageously be employed this year in this improvement.

From Florence to Riverton is a stretch of river which includes the Colbert and Big Tree shoals; these two are always taken together and regarded as a single obstacle. Since the improvement of Muscle Shoals they form the worst obstruction on the river between Chattanooga and the mouth, perhaps even the worst between Knoxville and the mouth. Congress attempted as early as 1829 to secure the improvement of these shoals, but without success. Subsequently between sixty and seventy thousand dollars was expended on the shoals in the construction of spur dams and training walls, small works of low relief, designed to contract the channel and deepen the water. The limit of possible improvement by works of this kind was soon reached, and the result was not satisfactory.

About ten years ago a board of engineer officers, duly appointed, prepared a plan for overcoming this obstacle by a lateral canal with two locks; that is to say, a canal which should leave the river above the falls, be excavated along in the south bank parallel and near to the river, and should return to it at deep water below the shoals. The water in the canal was to be maintained and vessels passed by means of locks, one at each end of the canal. It was estimated that this work would cost two and a half million dollars. The plan received the sanction of Congress and two appropriations have been made toward carrying it out. About $650,000 have actually been applied to the improvement, and this has sufficed to build the lower lock and to practically complete the approach to it.

The plan was hardly adopted, however, before the officer in charge of the work pointed out that the estimate was too small, and he thought that it would have to be increased at least $750,000. But little work was done until I took charge of the district about three years ago. Since then my assistants and myself have given most careful and exhaustive study to the whole subject of the improvement of these shoals. We were forced to the conclusion that the amount estimated by the board was too small, and that, not including the amount already expended, it would require, we think, $3,000,000 to complete the project. We also came to the conclusion that by abandoning the proposed lateral canal and using two locks and two dams across the river that we could secure an equally satisfactory improvement and could save a million and a half dollars by the change.

Congress alone has the authority to authorize the change of plan. It seemed to me that a saving of a million and a half dollars upon a single improvement on a river like the Tennessee was a matter of great importance and ought to be a source of much satisfaction to Congress and to the taxpayers. The work already done would apply equally well to the lateral canal or the lock and dam project, but it would not be possible to do very much more work without committing ourselves to one plan or the other. It therefore seemed to me to be my duty to describe to the River and Harbor Committee this proposed change of plan and to ask their authority to make it. This I did at the time of my hearing, and this I have done in my correspondence since that time.

No extensive or elaborate survey is necessary either to demonstrate the feasibility of the proposed change or to carry it into execution. A few measurements have to be made to determine the velocity of the current of the river at different stages and the quantity of water that it discharges, and a few soundings and borings have to be made to determine the best location for the dams and for the second lock. Some of this work has already been done, and the rest will be done before the money appropriated will be available for use.

It is my opinion that the proposed change of plan will greatly hasten the time of the completion of the improvement. If money is appropriated no faster in the future than it has been in the past it would shorten the work eight or ten years, and the money that we should save would be sufficient to complete the improvement of Little Muscle Shoals, or, if applied elsewhere, to remove all, or nearly all, of the minor obstacles from the river from Chattanooga to the mouth.

We do not need any time and we do not need any money for making a survey at Colbert Shoals. We can go forward with the old improvement if Congress thinks best to adhere to it, or we can change to the new plan and proceed with the work as soon as the money is available.

If Congress should see fit to authorize the Secretary of War to continue the improvement by a lateral canal or by locks and dams, whichever plan was the most economical and best, then the matter would have ample consideration and no time need be lost; but if Congress thinks that it is necessary to suspend judgment upon the matter for a year, we might still expend at least $100,000 most economically and advantageously in quarrying, cutting, and preparing the stone which will be needed in either case for the construction of the lock. This will enable us to take care of the expensive machinery and other plant which we have assembled for this work and to hold together our skilled force of engineers, mechanics, and laborers, which we have collected after much trouble and expense and which will be scattered and lost if we are unable to give them any employment for a year.

I am, sir, very respectfully,

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Major of Engineers.

Hon. JOHN A. MOON, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

Mr. Chairman, I am aware that the committee received communications from the Engineer Corps, and I am aware that in the multiplicity of their work they could not give that accurate and minute attention to this matter (after having once passed upon it under a misapprehension of the facts) which they would have liked to give. The correspondence with the engineer supports the position which I assume, that for the protection of the interests of the Government there should be an increase of this appropriation. I hope that the committee, in view of their misconstruction of the engineer communication——

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the first river and harbor bill of which I have had any individual knowledge was passed only seventeen years ago. That was before the days of combinations in the passage of these measures. That bill carried about $7,000,000. We have gone on under the new method that shortly afterwards was inaugurated until now, this year, we shall have an expenditure, or will authorize an expenditure, of $42,000,000. Twelve million dollars—nearly $13,000,000—of expenditures this year are not recognized or to be found in this bill. The friends of this class of extravagant expenditure adopted a few years ago the ingenious method of covering up some portion of the expenditures by dividing the amount and putting a part in the sundry civil bill, where the grand aggregate could not so readily be recognized.

I want to say at the very outset, as I have said before, that I shall make no opposition to the legitimate and proper expenditure of the public money for the purpose of improving rivers and harbors that will contribute to facilitating the commerce of this country. The great rivers, the great harbors, ought to be the objects of the solicitude of the Government and ought to be improved. What I object to is the ulterior purposes that are always covered in greater or less degree in the river and harbor bill of later days.

Simply to illustrate—and yet I am talking about a very old story—I remember that a President of the United States, commenting upon this character of expenditure, said a few years ago that we had expended $26,000,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and had secured upon two reaches where the great portion of the money had been expended 5 inches greater depth of water. A large part of $26,000,000 to secure upon those two reaches an increased depth of 5 inches!

Now, I know this line of remark will excite at once the wrath of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]. That improvement has been his child. He has fostered it wonderfully, and has succeeded in what I believe to have been his original purpose of erecting such barriers to the encroachments of the river upon plantations that the prosperity of his State has largely advanced.

I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that no reputable man will contend that with all the expenditures upon the Mississippi River there has been any considerable increased navigability given to that river. I make the statement boldly that each year the commerce of that river has decreased instead of increasing. Yet we have spent millions of dollars upon it; and after we have thus expended millions upon an elaborate system, I charge that that system has been substantially abandoned by its friends, and they have gone back to the old, primitive method of dredging, notwithstanding all the advances that have been made in hydraulic engineering in the last twenty years, and that now, wherever there is an effort to improve the navigation of the river, it is done by removing the sand bars by the old method of dredging.

I am not prepared to charge culpability upon any gentleman in connection with the appropriations in this bill; yet I do notice, and no one can avoid noticing, that in the improvement of the waterways especially affecting the State of the chairman of the committee more than four millions of appropriations are carried. If they wanted to improve the great waterways, the great harbors, I would not object; yet I am told that it is a custom with some gentlemen to locate themselves at an insignificant place, to build there a plant, and then come to Congress and insist that their property shall be made valuable by making it accessible. And I will ask the gentleman to say in his time whether he can not point out one or more places of that character.

I notice one instance in the State of Texas where an appropriation of $250,000 is proposed to improve a channel from Galveston to Texas City. Does anybody know where Texas City is? I am told there is one business establishment there. Some Ohio gentlemen, intent upon missionary work, went down to that place, located themselves at Texas City—or perhaps Texas City came after they located themselves [laughter]—and built a compress for the purpose of compressing cotton. There are two stores, I am told, in that "city," both owned by that Ohio capital. And now they come to Congress and ask for $250,000, which is several times the aggregate of the assessed wealth of the whole "city," to dig a trench in the sand in the bottom of the bay, across the movement of the waters—perpendicular to it—so that it can be annually filled and require an annual appropriation—in order to reach Texas City.

At Buffalo Bayou—I am sorry if I seem to imply that all these particularly odorous schemes are in Texas—at Buffalo Bayou, I think, is an engineering enterprise with some hydraulic peculiarities by which it is proposed to get from the Gulf up to Houston. I heard a gentleman describing not long ago his efforts to navigate that stream. He said that when he got upstream he had to back 15 miles before he could turn around; that the stream was so tortuous that in trying to turn some of the bends he would have tons of earth scraped from the bank on the bow of his boat and other tons on the opposite side on the stern of his boat. Yet I understand that $4,000,000 of the money of the people of the United States is, according to the contemplation of this bill, to be expended to improve that "great waterway," "that great artery of commerce," and to build up, or, rather, to accommodate, the commerce of the city of Houston.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is expenditures of this character that make this bill an unsavory one to the people of the United States. More than one-half of the appropriations carried by this bill are for the improvement of places where, for the purposes of description, geographical names have to be used that are not known to the people of the United States, except to those in the immediate locality of the places named. [Laughter.]

I say again, that I want to see the waterways of this country properly improved. I do not know that I entirely sympathize with my colleague from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS], and yet I can see how entirely natural it is that my colleague should insist on having his "share of the pork."

What are the facts in connection with the pending bill? The Missouri River gets $50,000 for 3,000 miles of alleged navigable waters. It borders my own district on the west. If a steamboat has ever passed up that portion of the stream adjacent to my district, if there has been one in the last ten years, I have never heard of it, and do not believe such an incident exists.

Mr. PERKINS. My colleague must remember that that portion of the river is under the commission——

Mr. HEPBURN. I was going to speak of that——

Mr. PERKINS. It is under the control of the Missouri River Commission, for which the gentleman will perceive that a large appropriation is made.

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). I was going to speak of that. There is a portion of the appropriation for that purpose. There is a portion of the river, from the city of Sioux City northward, that is navigable for a small boat, and is used by small boats. But there is a stretch of hundreds of miles of the river under the jurisdiction of the commission that has not had a single steamboat upon it in ten years within my own knowledge and in my belief. I certainly have never heard of one, Mr. Chairman, in that time.

Why, sir, the idea of controlling the navigation of that river is the greatest of absurdities, especially the lower stretches of it.

That is an independent stream. It goes where it pleases. The town of Hamburg, in my district, which was once "a port" or "harbor," to which all of the people of my country had to resort in the olden days of steamboat navigation, is an illustration. One day the Missouri River broke loose, and to-day our "port of entry," our "harbor," is 8 miles away from the Missouri River. [Laughter.]

I remember one year that we appropriated $375,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri River—an appropriation carried in the river and harbor bill. The improvement was to begin at the mouth of the river and be continuously carried on up the stream, under the plans and specifications of the Missouri River Commission. And they limited it, of course. It was tied up. But there was a proviso embodied that such portions of the appropriation as might be necessary to improve the harbors of eleven towns specified might be utilized.

I took the trouble to hunt the matter down, and found that these eleven "harbors" and towns consisted of the piers of eleven railway bridges which crossed the river, and every one was "improved" to the extent of strengthening these piers. [Laughter.] And that was where that expenditure or appropriation, under the plans of the commission, went.

A little while ago the Mississippi River Commission began a system of improvements by confining the waters with levies conveniently located to prevent the overflow of the plantations and to secure a uniform width of 4,000 feet. This required the building of artificial banks—often in the middle of the river—protecting them by spur dams to the shore and by other engineering processes. It was necessary to protect the banks with mattresses of willows, or wires, interwoven. A network of wires was necessary, and we proceeded in that manner to carry out the object or purpose which was contemplated in the system of "improvement." They proceeded for a little time in that manner, at a cost of about $49 per linear foot. They spent millions of dollars in their attempts to do the work.

At one time I was able to show to the House that the Mississippi River Commission owned and operated, or at least controlled, a larger number of boats—aye, more than twice as many—in the improvement which they were supposed to be making in the river than was to be found in the entire Navy of the United States. [Laughter.] More than 800 one report showed them to be the owners of, yet they found what it seems to me everybody ought to have known at the very beginning, that these mattresses or artificial constructions, made of the soft woods of that country, and subjected to alternate drought and moisture, rotted away within two or three years, and that the protection of the banks, and the false banks made by the commission, consisted simply of the strings of wire perpendicularly laid or strung from one post to another; and the result was that they abandoned that system of improvements and went back to the old methods which had been theretofore contemplated and suggested.

But I see that this bill carries a large appropriation for the improvement of the river and harbor of New Orleans. I do not know just what that means, Mr. Chairman; I can not well understand. I have been told that from bank to bank, opposite the city of New Orleans, there is a depth of 90 feet in high water.

I do know that there is some danger, at times at least, of the encroachment of the river upon the city, growing out of the fact that when you are back on the business streets of the city, if you want to look at a steamboat you must look up at an angle of 45 degrees, because the bottom of the boat is much above your head.

It may be that it is a wise and proper expenditure to meet the constant necessity for increasing the height of that bank that this money should be paid. But if that is it, I submit to the committee whether it is a legitimate expenditure to come from the Treasury of the United States.

The truth is, all of those gentlemen have an entirely different idea of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River from that of the man who lives above. When the river suits us, when it is at flood, then there is danger of overflowing below; then these gentlemen below want it improved, so that it will not overflow their plantations. When it is in good navigable condition for them, we want it improved by the removing of the sand bars and the obstructions to the passage of boats.

This difficulty of understanding what navigation means makes it almost impossible for my friends from Mississippi and myself ever to agree as to what ought to be done with the Mississippi River.

But now we are going to store vast quantities of the waters of the Mississippi River away up at the head in order to regulate the flow. Mr. Chairman, that regulation begins away above the point where the affluents of the Mississippi River meet it; above the Red River, above the Arkansas, above the White, above the Ohio, above the Missouri, above the Illinois, above the Des Moines, above all the tributaries that bear the floods, and away up at the head, in the vicinity of Lake Itasca, they propose to spend millions for the purpose of storing waters that never come there. There are no great floods there. They go above the great confluents of these rivers that bear the floods. And now they are going to improve the Mississippi River in that way.

I know how fruitless it is to talk about this. I know that the votes are now arranged for the passage of this bill. I know that there has been that measure of consultation that has secured the influence and the number of votes which are necessary. Appropriations have been judiciously made for that end.

The gentleman told us of the difficulties of selection, $200,000,000 being asked when only $30,000,000 could be provided for. They were afraid of making the bill too large. And now the harmony that the gentleman finds in this bill, the harmony that is so beautiful to him, means simply that distribution over States which brings the measure of support that will make the bill an undoubted success. [Laughter.] And the disturbance of that harmony which he fears is the discord that will come when, by another amendment, some fellow may get more than his share, or that, if his appropriation is stricken out, he might sulk in his tent.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. You may ask the question.

Mr. SHATTUC. Is your State left out of the bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. My State has not got a thing in it.

Mr. SHATTUC. I thought so. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I state that there is not a navigable stream in my district, or one that could be made so, and yet there are within it rivers that are magnificent in breadth and depth and read the statement of the engineer in charge. He enters into general discussion of the river improvement, the necessity for this great work, and concedes that the bill is fair in many of its parts, and that the appropriation, while not that which is desired, is perhaps just, in view of the other appropriations in the bill. The engineer says:

Twelve million dollars—nearly $13,000,000—of expenditures this year are not recognized or to be found in this bill. The friends of this class of extravagant expenditure adopted a few years ago the ingenious method of covering up some portion of the expenditures by dividing the amount and putting a part in the sundry civil bill, where the grand aggregate could not so readily be recognized.

I want to say at the very outset, as I have said before, that I shall make no opposition to the legitimate and proper expenditure of the public money for the purpose of improving rivers and harbors that will contribute to facilitating the commerce of this country. The great rivers, the great harbors, ought to be the objects of the solicitude of the Government and ought to be improved. What I object to is the ulterior purposes that are always covered in greater or less degree in the river and harbor bill of later days.

Simply to illustrate—and yet I am talking about a very old story—I remember that a President of the United States, commenting upon this character of expenditure, said a few years ago that we had expended $26,000,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Mississippi River and had secured upon two reaches where the great portion of the money had been expended 5 inches greater depth of water. A large part of $26,000,000 to secure upon those two reaches an increased depth of 5 inches!

Now, I know this line of remark will excite at once the wrath of my friend from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS]. That improvement has been his child. He has fostered it wonderfully, and has succeeded in what I believe to have been his original purpose of erecting such barriers to the encroachments of the river upon plantations that the prosperity of his State has largely advanced.

I undertake to say, Mr. Chairman, that no reputable man will contend that with all the expenditures upon the Mississippi River there has been any considerable increased navigability given to that river. I make the statement boldly that each year the commerce of that river has decreased instead of increasing. Yet we have spent millions of dollars upon it; and after we have thus expended millions upon an elaborate system, I charge that that system has been substantially abandoned by its friends, and they have gone back to the old, primitive method of dredging, notwithstanding all the advances that have been made in hydraulic engineering in the last twenty years, and that now, wherever there is an effort to improve the navigation of the river, it is done by removing the sand bars by the old method of dredging.

I am not prepared to charge culpability upon any gentleman in connection with the appropriations in this bill; yet I do notice, and no one can avoid noticing, that in the improvement of the waterways especially affecting the State of the chairman of the committee more than four millions of appropriations are carried. If they wanted to improve the great waterways, the great harbors, I would not object; yet I am told that it is a custom with some gentlemen to locate themselves at an insignificant place, to build there a plant, and then come to Congress and insist that their property shall be made valuable by making it accessible. And I will ask the gentleman to say in his time whether he can not point out one or more places of that character.

I notice one instance in the State of Texas where an appropriation of $350,000 is proposed to improve a channel from Galveston to Texas City. Does anybody know where Texas City is? I am told there is one business establishment there. Some Ohio gentlemen, intent upon missionary work, went down to that place, located themselves at Texas City—or perhaps Texas City came after they located themselves [laughter]—and built a compress for the purpose of compressing cotton. There are two stores, I am told, in that "city," both owned by that Ohio capital. And now they come to Congress and ask for $250,000, which is several times the aggregate of the assessed wealth of the whole "city," to dig a trench in the sand in the bottom of the bay, across the movement of the waters—perpendicular to it—so that it can be annually filled and require an annual appropriation—in order to reach Texas City.

At Buffalo Bayou—I am sorry if I seem to imply that all these particularly odorous schemes are in Texas—at Buffalo Bayou, I think, is an engineering enterprise with some hydraulic peculiarities by which it is proposed to get from the Gulf up to Houston. I heard a gentleman describing not long ago his efforts to navigate that stream. He said that when he got upstream he had to back 15 miles before he could turn around; that the stream was so tortuous that in trying to turn some of the bends he would have tons of earth scraped from the bank on the bow of his boat and other tons on the opposite side on the stern of his boat. Yet I understand that $4,000,000 of the money of the people of the United States is, according to the contemplation of this bill, to be expended to improve that "great waterway," "that great artery of commerce," and to build up, or, rather, to accommodate, the commerce of the city of Houston.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it is expenditures of this character that make this bill an unsavory one to the people of the United States. More than one-half of the appropriations carried by this bill are for the improvement of places where, for the purposes of description, geographical names have to be used that are not known to the people of the United States, except to those in the immediate locality of the places named. [Laughter.]

I say again, that I want to see the waterways of this country properly improved. I do not know that I entirely sympathize with my colleague from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS], and yet I can see how entirely natural it is that my colleague should insist on having his "share of the pork."

What are the facts in connection with the pending bill? The Missouri River gets $50,000 for 3,000 miles of alleged navigable waters. It borders my own district on the west. If a steamboat has ever passed up that portion of the stream adjacent to my district, if there has been one in the last ten years, I have never heard of it, and do not believe such an incident exists.

Mr. PERKINS. My colleague must remember that that portion of the river is under the commission——

Mr. HEPBURN. I was going to speak of that——

Mr. PERKINS. It is under the control of the Missouri River Commission, for which the gentleman will perceive that a large appropriation is made.

Mr. HEPBURN (continuing). I was going to speak of that. There is a portion of the appropriation for that purpose. There is a portion of the river, from the city of Sioux City northward, that is navigable for a small boat, and is used by small boats. But there is a stretch of hundreds of miles of the river under the jurisdiction of the commission that has not had a single steamboat upon it in ten years within my own knowledge and in my belief. I certainly have never heard of one, Mr. Chairman, in that time.

Why, sir, the idea of controlling the navigation of that river is the greatest of absurdities, especially the lower stretches of it.

That is an independent stream. It goes where it pleases. The town of Hamburg, in my district, which was once "a port" or "harbor," to which all of the people of my country had to resort in the olden days of steamboat navigation, is an illustration. One day the Missouri River broke loose, and to-day our "port of entry," our "harbor," is 8 miles away from the Missouri River. [Laughter.]

I remember one year that we appropriated $375,000 for the improvement of the navigation of the Missouri River—an appropriation carried in the river and harbor bill. The improvement was to begin at the mouth of the river and be continuously carried on up the stream, under the plans and specifications of the Missouri River Commission. And they limited it, of course. It was tied up. But there was a proviso embodied that such portions of the appropriation as might be necessary to improve the harbors of eleven towns specified might be utilized.

I took the trouble to hunt the matter down, and found that these eleven "harbors" and towns consisted of the piers of eleven railway bridges which crossed the river, and every one was "improved" to the extent of strengthening these piers. [Laughter.] And that was where that expenditure or appropriation, under the plans of the commission, went.

A little while ago the Mississippi River Commission began a system of improvements by confining the waters with levies conveniently located to prevent the overflow of the plantations and to secure a uniform width of 4,000 feet. This required the building of artificial banks—often in the middle of the river—protecting them by spur dams to the shore and by other engineering processes. It was necessary to protect the banks with mattresses of willows, or wires, interwoven. A network of wires was necessary, and we proceeded in that manner to carry out the object or purpose which was contemplated in the system of "improvement." They proceeded for a little time in that manner, at a cost of about $49 per linear foot. They spent millions of dollars in their attempts to do the work.

At one time I was able to show to the House that the Mississippi River Commission owned and operated, or at least controlled, a larger number of boats—aye, more than twice as many—in the improvement which they were supposed to be making in the river than was to be found in the entire Navy of the United States. [Laughter.] More than 800 one report showed them to be the owners of, yet they found what it seems to me everybody ought to have known at the very beginning, that these mattresses or artificial constructions, made of the soft woods of that country, and subjected to alternate drought and moisture, rotted away within two or three years, and that the protection of the banks, and the false banks made by the commission, consisted simply of the strings of wire perpendicularly laid or strung from one post to another; and the result was that they abandoned that system of improvements and went back to the old methods which had been theretofore contemplated and suggested.

But I see that this bill carries a large appropriation for the improvement of the river and harbor of New Orleans. I do not know just what that means, Mr. Chairman; I can not well understand. I have been told that from bank to bank, opposite the city of New Orleans, there is a depth of 90 feet in high water.

I do know that there is some danger, at times at least, of the encroachment of the river upon the city, growing out of the fact that when you are back on the business streets of the city, if you want to look at a steamboat you must look up at an angle of 45 degrees, because the bottom of the boat is much above your head.

It may be that it is a wise and proper expenditure to meet the constant necessity for increasing the height of that bank that this money should be paid. But if that is it, I submit to the committee whether it is a legitimate expenditure to come from the Treasury of the United States.

The truth is, all of those gentlemen have an entirely different idea of improving the navigation of the Mississippi River from that of the man who lives above. When the river suits us, when it is at flood, then there is danger of overflowing below; then these gentlemen below want it improved, so that it will not overflow their plantations. When it is in good navigable condition for them, we want it improved by the removing of the sand bars and the obstructions to the passage of boats.

This difficulty of understanding what navigation means makes it almost impossible for my friends from Mississippi and myself ever to agree as to what ought to be done with the Mississippi River.

But now we are going to store vast quantities of the waters of the Mississippi River away up at the head in order to regulate the flow. Mr. Chairman, that regulation begins away above the point where the affluents of the Mississippi River meet it; above the Red River, above the Arkansas, above the White, above the Ohio, above the Missouri, above the Illinois, above the Des Moines, above all the tributaries that bear the floods, and away up at the head, in the vicinity of Lake Itasca, they propose to spend millions for the purpose of storing waters that never come there. There are no great floods there. They go above the great confluents of these rivers that bear the floods. And now they are going to improve the Mississippi River in that way.

I know how fruitless it is to talk about this. I know that the votes are now arranged for the passage of this bill. I know that there has been that measure of consultation that has secured the influence and the number of votes which are necessary. Appropriations have been judiciously made for that end.

The gentleman told us of the difficulties of selection, $200,000,000 being asked when only $30,000,000 could be provided for. They were afraid of making the bill too large. And now the harmony that the gentleman finds in this bill, the harmony that is so beautiful to him, means simply that distribution over States which brings the measure of support that will make the bill an undoubted success. [Laughter.] And the disturbance of that harmony which he fears is the discord that will come when, by another amendment, some fellow may get more than his share, or that, if his appropriation is stricken out, he might sulk in his tent.

Mr. SHATTUC. May I ask my friend a question?

Mr. HEPBURN. You may ask the question.

Mr. SHATTUC. Is your State left out of the bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. My State has not got a thing in it.

Mr. SHATTUC. I thought so. [Laughter.]

Mr. HEPBURN. I state that there is not a navigable stream in my district, or one that could be made so, and yet there are within it rivers that are magnificent in breadth and depth and length in comparison with some of those that are "improved" in this bill. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I should like to make a single suggestion to the gentleman. I know he would not do an injustice to any State in this Union. Ohio has sins enough of her own to bear without being charged up with anything that belongs to another State.

A MEMBER. That is so. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Now, I am told there is not a dollar of the investment at Texas City which comes from the State of Ohio, but that it does come exclusively from the State of Minnesota. I hope the gentleman will allow that statement to be made under the circumstances.

Mr. HEPBURN. I made the statement as it came to me, and I am perfectly willing to make the correction, or to allow it to be made, for I agree with the gentleman that Ohio has enough to answer for already. [Laughter.] But whether it was Ohio that was the original offender or not, I would ask my friend if it was not a Cleveland man who came before the committee as the agent and attorney of the corporation and that begged with tears in his eyes for the appropriation?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, I am suffering so much from hoarseness that I fear I shall not be able to make myself understood; but I do desire to speak a few words, Mr. Chairman, in respect to what has been said by my honored and distinguished friend from Iowa. It is an old story between him and me. It may be new, as doubtless it is, to those of our colleagues who have not been present when a river and harbor bill has been under consideration. All that he has had to say about the Mississippi River, which is his bête noir, above all things, he has said many times, and precisely in the same language that he has used to-day. He has announced so often, Mr. Chairman, that he is in favor of what he calls a proper river and harbor bill that I am inclined to think that he really believes that he is; but he is the only person on the face of the earth he has ever succeeded in fooling.

Now, he attempted to make little of Buffalo Bayou. That is not in my State and does not concern me or my constituency at all; yet Buffalo Bayou during the last fiscal year carried out from the city of Houston thirty millions of commerce, including more than 500,000 bales of cotton. There are few streams of this whole United States which are more useful arteries than this bayou which he has attempted to ridicule.

So far as the Mississippi River is concerned, I think my friend a little regrets that this bill carries not a dollar for its improvement. It is a supreme pleasure to him, from some cause, to attempt to belittle that great work, in which the Government for so many years has been engaged, of improving the greatest river on the globe.

I had in my hand only yesterday, Mr. Chairman, a report submitted by the Senate Committee on Commerce, which in the spring of last year inquired into all the work which the Government has done, and among other things stated by them was the fact that $47,000,000 had been expended in the construction of levees on the banks to save the riparian owners from its desolating floods, and that of that $47,000,000, nearly $35,000,000 had been expended by the people themselves. Is not it a story calculated to arouse the sympathies of every man on this floor? My own Congressional district, embracing but a small part of the valley which is subject to overflow, has not only taxed itself as no other Congressional district in the United States has done, but it has issued its bonds for $4,000,000 and sold them, and their proceeds have gone into these earthen walls, in their effort to secure for themselves safety and protection.

The gentleman is entirely mistaken when he says that the construction of these levees affords no relief for the maintenance of that river as an artery of commerce. It has been almost the unanimous judgment of all engineers who have investigated or inquired into it that there can be no improvement of a permanent character of that great stream which does not take into consideration the control of these vast and desolating floods. He complains that we have spent many millions of dollars in an attempt to narrow the channel by dikes and in the effort to protect the banks from erosion by revetment. What he says is true; but, Mr. Chairman, it was because when the work was begun and carried on by the Mississippi River Commission there was no man in the United States of engineering skill who did not believe that by those methods the desired results could be secured.

But the gentleman says they have reverted to the old system of dredging. It is not true. It has only been in the last few years that the mechanical skill of engineers has constructed a dredge that can be used for this purpose. I allude, Mr. Chairman, to the hydraulic dredge, sometimes called the suction dredge. It was only invented in 1854, and then was rejected for some cause by the engineers; but it was experimented with from year to year, until about seven or eight years ago it was developed into the most astonishing machine which is known to-day to mechanics. As soon as it was discovered that a machine had been constructed in such manner that its great powers might be used to dredge out the river, the Mississippi River Commission, as it should have done, promptly stated in reports to Congress that the works that had been done and were being done by these slow and costly processes should be supplemented by the use of hydraulic dredges. There was no extravagance about it. They had done the best they could with the amount at their command and all known engineering devices, and to-day they are doing the best they can by the free use of these dredges.

Why, Mr. Chairman, one of these splendid hydraulic dredges, recently constructed, has removed as much as 5,700 cubic yards of earth in an hour, almost incredible, almost beyond the power of the human mind to compute. They are doing splendid work; and when they have constructed ten or twelve of them, I have no doubt that low-water navigation will have been secured; and when we can have reached a point where the high waters shall be confined by the construction of levees, we will have a great river such as no continent of the world can boast. And see what incidental benefits will result from it, Mr. Chairman! Thirty-two thousand square miles of magnificent land will have been protected from overflow. A distinguished writer has said that the Mississippi Valley is like a jug of cream; that the richest soil from the Western States has been washed down by the river and used in building up this magnificent empire; and it is true. It is scarcely yet touched by the husbandman.

Go to my district, and I will show you primeval forests, magnificent, gigantic, and splendid to behold, which remain to be felled to make room for the farmer of this country. I undertake to say that the small pittance of $13,000,000 donated by the Government has given more hope to more American hearts and has rendered more actual and immediate benefit to the people of this country than any other sum which it has expended anywhere for any other purpose. [Applause.] I know that my friend, with all his satire, and scorn, and his bitter tongue, will never be able to stay the progress of that great work. I know it will go on and on and on until this Government, acting in cooperation with the people of that valley, will see that these splendid levees are built, so that behind them these people can sow their crops and harvest them in peace and safety.

I have never been able to quite understand why it is that the distinguished and able Representative should pervert his talents in this regard as he seems to love to do. I hope that the time will come when his eloquence may be availed of in behalf of these people who have striven with superhuman efforts to protect themselves. They are not mendicants; they are magnificent, heroic American citizens, who are not only willing to do their part, Mr. Chairman, but who have done many times more than any people have done in connection with government work. I wish I could take my friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] and let him see what an overflow means; let him pass over these splendid plantations, which add so much to the commerce of this country, and see the watermarks, 10, 15, and 20 feet high on their houses and on the trees.

Why, at times there is a sea of water 70 or 80 miles wide; no roads, no telegraph facilities, no mails, no communication with the outer world; people accumulated in ginhouses and on the roofs of houses or on a little bit of unbroken levee, with their cattle, hogs, and horses. Why, sir, it is a spectacle that would make the hardest-hearted man weep in sympathy; and yet, because the Government has doled out its pittance from its magnificent wealth, my friend grows angry and never lets an opportunity go by to misrepresent and pervert the facts in regard to this work.

I do not know, Mr. Chairman, that I need to say more. My throat is in such condition that I had not intended to speak at all, and I will leave it to my honorable friend from Ohio to make a fitting reply to such other criticisms as may be made of the bill. But before taking my seat, I will say that this bill has been prepared with a care and conservatism and untiring spirit of inquiry that I have never before seen in a committee room. I venture to make the assertion that in all its parts it is honest, clean, wise, and just. In view of the limited sum which we felt at liberty to expend, I do not believe any committee from any body of men on the globe could have taken it and distributed it more justly, more wisely, having in view the welfare of this country. [Applause.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, how much time is there remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. Fourteen minutes.

Mr. BURTON. I will yield five minutes to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL].

Mr. BALL. Mr. Chairman, those of us who are serving on the Rivers and Harbors Committee may perhaps, in our zeal to produce water competition and thereby regulate railroad transportation, sometimes make mistakes and give appropriations where they ought not to go or where they are not altogether desirable. In this we are unlike the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], whose State contains no navigable river, whose interests are all with the corporations which the rivers and harbors competition is designed to regulate. It is to be expected that he should imbibe something of the prejudice of the transportation companies (which always have his careful attention and regard) against river and harbor improvement.

Mr. PERKINS. Will the gentleman allow me?

Mr. BALL. I have but a few minutes.

Mr. PERKINS. The State of Iowa is bounded on one side by the Mississippi River and on the other by the Missouri River.

Mr. BALL. I am not speaking of the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. PERKINS, but the gentleman from Iowa, Mr. HEPBURN, who said there were no navigable rivers in his district. Now, Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is as unfortunate in the selection of some of his subjects of criticism as was the distinguished Kentuckian who injured his political career when he condemned and ridiculed the prospective city of Duluth; he is as unfortunate as was the gentleman who assaulted a river and harbor bill by selecting Buttermilk Channel, on account of its name, as a subject for ridicule, not knowing it to be in the great harbor of New York.

When he speaks with derision of the great enterprise which is presented in this bill from the district I have the honor to represent, he is unfortunate in his statements, and he ought not, without consultation with members who have the honor to represent constituencies on this floor, to retail scandalous statements that come from those either inclined to disregard truth under all circumstances or to indulge in mere idle pleasantries. The Buffalo Bayou and Galveston Ship Channel, I will say to the gentleman from Iowa, transported last year in the neighborhood of $30,000,000, including more than 500,000 bales of cotton, and the city of Houston, at the head of that tide-water stream, received within four months of the present season more than 2,000,000 bales of cotton.

The reports of the Government engineers show that to the farmers of the West—the farmers of Kansas, Nebraska, and other States—this proposed improvement will save more than $600,000 per annum. And when the gentleman attacks appropriations of this kind—because the House has become accustomed to listen to the gentleman from Iowa, who is always eloquent in debate—he should at least, in justice to the appropriations which he attacks and in justice to himself, before exercising his great influence and wonderful powers of debate, seek to inform himself as to the facts. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY rose.

The CHAIRMAN. There are only nine minutes remaining. Does the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] yield to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY]?

Mr. HAWLEY. I ask but a few minutes.

Mr. HEPBURN. Did the Chair address me?

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state that the gentleman from Iowa occupied twenty-five minutes, consuming all the time left in opposition to the bill. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] has consumed all the time in favor of the bill except nine minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Before I proceed——

The CHAIRMAN. One moment. The Chair has not recognized the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON. If the gentleman from Texas will be satisfied with five minutes, I will yield to him. I would like to have a few minutes to close the debate.

Mr. HAWLEY. Very well; I will accept five minutes.

Mr. BURTON. I take the liberty of asking the gentleman whether he is for or against the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I do not wish to antagonize the bill as a whole. I intend to speak in opposition to one item.

Mr. BURTON. Very well. I yield the gentleman four minutes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, it is with some reluctance that I rise to speak in opposition to any part of this bill; and my reluctance can be appreciated when I say that that part relates to an improvement at my own home. In thus opposing this appropriation I wish to say I am not in any way opposed to the work of development there; but it is because of the simple and at once apprehended fact that there is no basis for undertaking at this time the work provided for in this particular item of the bill. Contrary to the views just expressed in opposition to this bill, I think it is, in the main, one of the great features of the economic and industrial development of our national life.

I believe that the improvement of the great rivers and harbors—and some of the lesser rivers and lesser harbors, if you will—has contributed to that enormous increase in foreign business as much as any other element in the progress and development of all the business that we now control in foreign lands. But a measure of this kind should be undertaken advisedly. It should be done upon the recommendation and under the control and with the approbation of that branch of our Government to which we have always been expected to look for guidance and direction in every proposition for developing our rivers and harbors.

The United States engineers—an able corps, upon which Congress has always relied for whatever it desired to know and to do in the development of our rivers and harbors—have been appealed to with respect to the particular measure to which I shall offer an amendment when it is appropriate to do so. But without their recommendation, without their statement that the work is advisable, that the commerce there needs it, or that it is practicable as an engineering proposition, this item has been inserted in the bill.

It is true, as stated by the gentleman from Iowa, that an eloquent and persuasive gentleman from Cleveland was here in advocacy of this measure. But it is also true that his statements were the only or the chief evidence at the time of his presentation of the case by which the committee could be informed or advised as to the feasibility of the work or its effect upon the channel through which it is to be carried out. In accordance, as I understand, with the usage here the engineer officers of the Army are usually appealed to through an authorization in Congress to state what is advisable, what is feasible in respect to any given work, and what is the estimated cost.

This information is obtained before the improvement is passed upon by the River and Harbor Committee. If that is not done, the proposition is without parliamentary basis. In this case, as the committee understand perfectly well, there was a great deal of discussion during the sitting of the committee as to what constituted a parliamentary basis.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Texas has expired.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg to say that I shall at the appropriate time, when I offer my amendment to the item which I have undertaken in this brief moment to discuss, continue my remarks.

Mr. BURTON rose.

Mr. HEPBURN. Before the gentleman from Ohio proceeds, I should like to ask him whether there have ever been surveys and estimates made for the improvement for which appropriations are proposed on page 12 of this bill.

Mr. BURTON. What is the item?

Mr. HEPBURN. Improving the outer bar at Brunswick, Ga.

Mr. BURTON. I will answer that question if I have time. If not now, I will do so when the item is reached.

Mr. Chairman, I wish the opponents of this bill would caucus and decide on some line of policy. I make this suggestion particularly to the gentlemen from Iowa. The member representing the interests at Sioux City criticises the bill severely because it does not provide for preserving the banks there, where there is no commerce. The other members from Iowa criticise it because it makes too much provision for commerce throughout the country. So the bill is in the position of poor King Lear's fool. One member of the family whipped him because he lied, and another member whipped him because he told the truth.

We have endeavored, as far as possible, to make all the items in this bill of value. In regard to the claim of the gentleman representing the interests at Sioux City, while I do not pretend to answer the question as to whether those banks should be protected by the General Government, I do say it is incongruous and out of place to bring into a river and harbor bill a provision for the preservation of the banks of a river where there is no commerce whatever, or but a very trivial amount.

In regard to the arguments that railway freights are regulated by commerce on that river, I do not believe that 20,000 tons in 1,660 miles can have very much influence in regulating the freight rate on the railways. A good many sins have been committed in this river and harbor bill in years past under that specious argument. The argument that the exactions of the railways should be prevented by river and harbor improvements is worthy of consideration; but we should not overlook the fact that transportation by water and freight carrying by railway occupy two different fields.

Neither can intrude upon the province of the other without loss. I am very much surprised, I must confess, at the remarks of the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY] in reference to the improvement proposed and the channel which is sought to be improved to Texas City in view of the fact that the bill was offered——

Mr. HAWLEY. I will explain in my own time.

Mr. BURTON (continuing). Inasmuch as he himself called for the estimates and the recommendations of the engineers on the subject. The estimates submitted by the engineers were presented, and the committee found, on an examination, that some $8,000,000 had been expended to improve the harbor of Galveston.

Mr. Chairman, there are some points which should be considered in connection with the matter. Very limited wharf room or dock room exists at that point. That which does exist is under the control, or monopoly, of the Galveston Wharf and Dock Company, which charges a high tariff on all vessels loading or unloading there. I might illustrate by saying that they have one regulation that when a boat comes from the neighborhood which is partly loaded it will be charged not only for the cargo put on at the Galveston wharf, but for the entire cargo which has been loaded on elsewhere——

A MEMBER. One thousand eight hundred cars were detained at Galveston at one time because they were unable to discharge their cargo.

Mr. BURTON (continuing). An estimate was made that for $500,000 this channel could be carried to Texas City, across the harbor, where there was an abundance of high ground and satisfactory railroad facilities to enable this business to be properly carried on; and the committee thought it the best solution of the problem, and recommended the appropriation provided in the bill for that purpose.

Now, if the Texas delegation is opposed to it, of course there is no objection on the part of the committee, as far as I am aware, to make such amendments as they may suggest or to strike this out.

Mr. HAWLEY. If the gentleman will permit me, the Texas interests have not been consulted. The question does not seem to have been clearly understood.

Let me ask the gentleman in this connection, since he speaks of the possibility of constructing this new channel, what evidence has he that this channel is practicable, or that it can be permanently maintained if you succeed in constructing it?

Mr. BURTON. We have the statement of the engineers on the subject——

Mr. HAWLEY. There are other points that the gentleman should consider in that connection.

Mr. BURTON (continuing). And I am surprised that the gentleman says that the Texas interests are not favorable to this improvement, when he himself introduced the resolution calling for the survey and the estimates of the engineers.

Mr. HAWLEY. I think I will be able to explain to the House with reference to the matter to which the gentleman refers.

Mr. BURTON. It has been shown that the channel can be maintained to 14 feet depth.

But distinctly, now, let me state to the gentleman from Texas, and to those who entertain like views, that if he does not want the appropriation it goes right out of the bill. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. But the gentleman does not answer the suggestion I have made——

Mr. BURTON. I have shown the gentleman the grounds on which the committee acted.

Mr. HAWLEY (continuing). And I think I can show to the members on this floor, especially those from Ohio——

Mr. BURTON. Let me say to the gentleman that no lawyer from Ohio has any special standing before the River and Harbor Committee.

Mr. HAWLEY. What information, let me ask the gentleman, had the committee to go on in reference to this matter?

Mr. BURTON. The committee, I will state, had some discussion on this subject. We had the engineer's report before us. A difference of opinion existed.

The rule adopted in reference to these matters was that when the figures were before the committee we could insert the provisions for a project where, in the judgment of the committee, there seemed to be propriety in making such provision. Consequently in this case that action was taken.

The CHAIRMAN. The time for general debate has expired under the order of the House, and the Clerk will report the bill by sections for amendment and debate under the five-minute rule.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Improving harbor at Hyannis, Mass.: Completing improvement, $2,162.

Mr. TONGUE. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, I am not prepared to say that the appropriation for this harbor is not proper. I merely wish to call attention to the fact that there has already been expended upon this harbor the sum of $133,592.92, and that to complete the project contemplated will require an expenditure of $376,000 more; that the total commerce of the harbor, according to the report of the engineer, was in 1894, 7,975 tons, and in 1897, 14,823 tons. There are in this bill some twenty different items of appropriation for the same State, aggregating something over $1,000,000.

While not prepared to say that these appropriations are not correct, I am prepared to say that the treatment accorded to Massachusetts, which has a member upon that committee, and the treatment accorded to the State of Oregon, which has not a member on that committee, do not measure out equal or exact justice.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Will my friend allow me?

Mr. TONGUE. I have but five minutes. The district which I have the honor to represent has a seacoast of about 300 miles. There are upon that coast some 10 different harbors. This bill proposes to appropriate for those the magnificent sum of $42,000, and repeals projects now in existence appropriating $512,000; so that this bill, distributing about $30,000,000 to the different States, contributes nothing to the State of Oregon, or at least to the Congressional district which I represent, but, on the other hand, takes from it nearly half a million of dollars.

In repealing one of these provisions where authority has been granted to make a contract, the objection is made that the commerce is not sufficient. Even in its present neglected condition the commerce exceeds that of the harbor just under consideration. They propose to repeal the law authorizing a contract, that was passed in 1896, that has been approved by two Secretaries of War, that has the formal approval of two Chiefs of Engineers, under two separate Administrations. The contract has been advertised, and has been let at one-half the estimated price. The contract and bond have been signed, and are now in the hands of the Engineering Department. There is connecting with that harbor about 150 miles of railroad. The owners of it are preparing to extend that line some two or three hundred miles farther. They are simply lacking facilities for shipping the products that may pass over that road.

Now, while we are receiving this treatment, here is a harbor where it is proposed in past and future appropriations to expend somewhere near half a million dollars and which has a commerce of 14,000 tons.

I have made a somewhat hasty, but I think a substantial, computation of the several amounts appropriated by this bill directly and on contracts to be authorized to be expended upon improvements within the several States. According to that, they are as follows:

For improvements within States represented upon the Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

State.	Amount.	State.	Amount.
Ohio	$2,586,500.00	Kentucky	$368,173.20
Wisconsin	529,320.00	Florida	1,209,199.80
Massachusetts	1,005,840.36	Texas	799,000.00
Illinois	1,659,656.00	For reservoir at the head of the Mississippi River	210,000.00
Michigan	2,559,075.00
Pennsylvania	736,218.00
Minnesota	1,311,259.33	Improving the Ohio River from head to mouth, various sums aggregating	2,075,000.00
New York	5,488,613.00
Mississippi	361,199.80
Georgia	1,003,000.00
Alabama	1,571,000.00
Arkansas	429,815.00	Total	24,062,869.49

Appropriations for other States.

State.	Amount.	State.	Amount.
Indiana	$7,500.00	Louisiana	$878,115.75
Rhode Island	305,827.00	California	1,011,620.00
Connecticut	425,100.00	Oregon (which includes improvement for the Columbia River, forming the boundary line between Oregon and Washington)	188,000.00
New Hampshire	32,000.00
Vermont	21,000.00
New Jersey	141,500.00
Delaware	239,780.00
Maryland	316,000.00
Virginia	493,950.00	Washington	66,000.00
District of Columbia	50,000.00	Idaho	10,000.00
South Carolina	203,000.00
North Carolina	189,000.00	Total	4,578,302.75

If these figures are correct, one-third of the States which are represented by members upon this committee receive three-fourths of the amount appropriated and authorized to be contracted for by this bill.

Mr. Chairman, I ask to withdraw the formal motion.

Mr. BURTON. I wish to say a few words on that. I should have preferred that the gentleman from Oregon had waited until the provisions pertaining to his State had been reached before making this argument. If he is equally inaccurate in his statements in reference to Oregon as in his statements in reference to the port of Hyannis, Mass., the House will hardly be influenced very much by what he has to say. He makes the statement that $376,000 is to be hereafter expended upon this harbor. Not one additional cent besides the $2,116 provided in this bill is contemplated to be expended upon it.

The port of Hyannis is an important harbor of refuge. It is true it had a commerce of only 25,020 tons last year, but 2,700 boats used it as a harbor of refuge. It is the only harbor of refuge for a considerable stretch on the Massachusetts coast, and the object of this appropriation of $2,162 is to complete the space for anchorage on the interior, giving more room for boats, and to prevent crowding.

Mr. TONGUE. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. TONGUE. The gentleman has questioned the accuracy of my statement, and I will ask him if there is not an existing project providing for the improvement of the harbor of Hyannis, and estimating the amount at $376,000? And I refer to page 905 of the report of the Board of Engineers.

Mr. BURTON. That has nothing whatever to do with this appropriation. There is not the least probability of its ever being made. I trust the gentleman from Oregon, in giving figures by States, will not overlook the fact that in the appropriations last made for rivers and harbors the State of Oregon received approximately $3.50 for each inhabitant of the State, while the State of New York received only 25 cents. I ask him to examine along that line of statistics, and trust he may not omit that from the remarks he may print on the subject.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving New Haven Harbor, Connecticut, in accordance with the project submitted by Maj. Smith S. Leach, dated June 23, 1897, and printed as House Document No. 82, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, $50,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for materials and work necessary to complete so much of said project as includes a channel 20 feet deep through Long Island Sound from Tomlinson's Bridge, including three interior basins affording separate anchorages with depths of 20, 16, and 12 feet, respectively, and connected by adequate channels, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $295,000, exclusive of the amount herein and heretofore appropriated.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, there is an error in one word in line 12. I move to strike out the word "second" and insert the word "first."

The Clerk read as follows:

Page 6, line 12, strike out the word "second" and insert the word "first."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving New York Harbor, New York: For maintenance, $100,000. For improving said harbor by a deep channel, 2,000 feet wide and 35 feet deep from the Narrows, by the so-called East Channel across Sandy Hook Bar to the open sea, in accordance with the recommendations contained in House Document No. 159, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, $1,000,000: Provided, That the Secretary of War may enter into a contract or contracts for such materials and work as may be necessary for the completion of said project, to be paid for as appropriations may, from time to time, be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $1,510,000, exclusive of the amount herein and heretofore appropriated.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. Chairman, in February last I introduced a resolution into the House taking preliminary steps for the digging of a channel from Governors Island to deep water, said channel to be a thousand feet wide and 40 feet deep. On February 24 I received the following letter from a distinguished citizen of New York:

NEW YORK, N. Y., February 24, 1898.

MY DEAR CONGRESSMAN: During the year 1897 the commercial showing of the port of New York was relatively bad.

In no respect did it bear to the sum total the proportion that it should have borne.

These facts give great concern to all interested in the prosperity of New York.

Our natural advantages of location, of harbor, and of accessibility from all points are complete.

But these natural advantages must be supplemented by art, by judicious effort, and well-directed enterprise. In these directions the citizens must move at once and with united vigor.

The demands of ocean commerce constantly augment the size of vessels.

But New York does not adequately respond to them, either in the improvement of her sea approaches or in the enlargement of her docking and other harbor facilities.

In these vital particulars it is not too much to say that New York is trying to accommodate the commerce of to-day with the facilities of ten years ago.

In other words, New York has not kept pace with the growth of her own commerce, and at this moment gives no palpable promise of adequate effort either to catch up or to keep pace with it in the future.

The approaches by sea are of course controlled by the United States. Year by year they become less and less adequate to easy or even safe navigation by vessels of the constantly increasing dimensions which the commerce of New York demands and creates.

Every grounding of a vessel in these approaches is a reproach to New York, a blow at her prestige as a port, and a menace to her commercial supremacy.

It is not enough that New York's approaches and harbor facilities should be equal to those of rival ports. They must be superior.

Just in proportion as they are superior will her ascendency as the emporium and metropolis of the Western Hemisphere be assured. And in proportion as rival ports approach equality with New York, in such ratio must New York's supremacy decline.

Other cities are making the most strenuous efforts to reach equality with New York in such conditions. Is New York putting forth commensurate endeavor? No.

Such a state of things must exist no longer.

It is not an affair of politics or parties; not a concern of classes or factions.

It is not merely the common concern of every person who depends on the prosperity of New York for occupation and bread.

It is more than that. It is the common concern of the general public of the United States, habituated to regard New York as the natural emporium of the nation, by every law of geography and climate, by every rule of convenience and economy.

The sea approaches to New York Harbor must be placed in a condition that will dismiss the question of tides from the problem of navigation.

Our organization, no less by tradition than by platform, is pledged to every possible effort for the material aggrandizement of New York, and this obligation has been vastly enlarged in weight and scope by the new municipal conditions.

Let me impress upon you that at this moment not all other public questions combined are more important to the Representatives of New York than the subject of this letter.

Yours, truly, RICHARD CROKER.

Mr. Chairman, there is the case in a nutshell. It is a clear, clean, and concise statement, an initial step toward securing deep water for New York Harbor. Since then commercial associations have taken the matter up, and we are on the eve of a realization of the work. Six days before the receipt of this letter I had the honor to introduce the bill to which I have referred. The chairman of the River and Harbor Committee at that time (the Hon. Warren B. Hooker) told me that if I would kindly refrain from pressing it then he would use his best endeavors to incorporate the plan in the next river and harbor bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I ask that my time be extended five minutes.

Mr. BENNETT. I move that the time of the gentleman be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman asks unanimous consent that the time of his colleague be extended five minutes. The Chair hears no objection.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I appeared before the present Committee on Rivers and Harbors and advocated my proposition. I have no doubt that the new chairman, the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], has come as close to giving me what I wanted as he could in prudence. I have no fault to find with him. I accept what he has offered in the bill with thanks; but at the same time I give notice that as soon as we have 35 feet of water I shall endeavor to secure an appropriation for 40 feet of water. The 35 feet of water now provided for only refers to the East Channel. It does not come this side of the Narrows. It seems to me that my original proposition was much better—that this channel should have been dug from the mouth of the East River to the sea. I am more than ever convinced that I was right since the disaster to the battle ship Massachusetts. That vessel, Mr. Chairman, ran upon the rocks near Governors Island, and had the bottom almost torn out of her. It may cost the Government from $100,000 to $150,000 to repair her; and I must confess that I am surprised to see that there is no appropriation here for the removal of Diamond Reef.

Mr. BERRY. I would like to ask the gentleman from New York a question, if he will yield?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Certainly.

Mr. BERRY. Does not the gentleman think it would be better to have some merchant marine of our own before we make any larger expenditures of that kind?

Mr. CUMMINGS. Well, give us plenty of water, and our merchant marine will develop without issuing American registers to foreign-built vessels. I shall do what I can toward restoring our merchant marine to its former glory.

Mr. BENNETT. I desire to state to the gentleman from New York that there is a provision in the bill for the removal of Diamond Reef.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Very well, Mr. Chairman, I take back what I said, and give the gentleman from Ohio full credit.

Mr. BENNETT. As well as Coenties Slip.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I find in the Criterion an article written by E. H. Mullin, an old friend, which amply supplements the letter from Mr. Croker. He says in effect that upon the favorable answer of Congress rests the development of trans-Atlantic steamships to a size, strength, and speed now without any parallel. During the past ten years the length of these great steamships has increased from 520 feet—the length of the Etruria—to 704 feet, the length of the new Oceanic, just launched at Belfast. The indicated horsepower, during the same period, has risen from 14,500 with a single screw to 30,000 with twin screws. The sea speed has gone up from 19 to 22 knots per hour.

These are great advances, but the limit seems to have been reached unless provision is made by Congress so that vessels of 40-foot draft can enter or leave the harbor at all states of the tide. Aside from this, it is the only port in the world whose trade offers sufficient inducement to capitalists to build bigger and deeper steamships. Any other harbor channel on our Atlantic coast might be deepened to 100 feet and made as straight as an arrow without attracting a single vessel the size of a Lucania. Nearly 70 per cent of the imports which the United States consume is shipped from Europe to New York warehouses and handled by New York merchants, and half of the exports go out by the same channel.

We hear a great deal about the Peninsular and Oriental and other famous lines to the East Indies and Australia, but their largest steamships are only half the size of the Lucania, with about one-fourth the horsepower, while the average is very much lower. There is thus a steamship for every day of the week leaving New York which is twice as large in its European port as any other steamship bound for anywhere else. The present limit of draft in the largest passenger steamships entering New York Harbor is 29 feet, which barely allows them to go through the 30-foot channel at low spring tides.

But the average proportion of draft to breadth of the St. Louis, Lucania, Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse, and Teutonic now averages only 44 per cent, instead of 50 per cent, as it would be if the channel were 40 feet deep at low spring tides, instead of 30 as it is now. And the loss will be even more serious with the new Oceanic, because, with a length of 704 feet, she should have a draft of 35 feet instead of 32 at the most, the difference between mean high and low water in New York Harbor being only 4½ feet. Mr. Mullin says:

If we can imagine a steamship with a maximum draft of 42 feet on the average lines of the four vessels to which we have already referred, we shall be able more easily to understand the advantages of a deep channel. Such a vessel would be 820 feet in length, 93 feet 4 inches in breadth, and 61 feet in depth. Its displacement would be approximately 60,000 tons, equal to three times that of the Lucania or four times that of the largest British warship afloat. Though three times the displacement of the Lucania, which has 30,000 indicated horsepower, this vessel could steam at the same rate—22 knots—with about only double the indicated horsepower.

If the horsepower were increased in proportion to the displacement, it would be 90,000, or 1½ horsepower for each ton, and it is quite probable that with engines of this monstrous size she could cross the Atlantic in four days and a half at a speed of a fraction over 25 knots an hour. She could furnish cabin accommodation of the present kind for 1,500 first-cabin passengers, or could give real bedrooms and sitting rooms for 500 moderately rich persons. The new Oceanic will have a gross tonnage of 17,000, which means that she will have a displacement of about 32,000 tons, or three-fifths larger again than the Lucania. Thus she will be heavier than the Great Eastern as well as being 20 feet longer. If the Lucania is thus put in the shade in five years, what may not happen to the Oceanic before 1910?

The new channel, generally called the East Channel, would leave the present main channel opposite Nortons Point, just below the Narrows, and go straight out to 7-fathom soundings by keeping SE. ¼ E. magnetic. It would be 4½ miles long, through sand and broken shells, and 1½ miles of this length is already 23 feet deep. Not only would it allow large steamships to come up night or day at all states of the tide, but it would give them a chance of coming up safely in heavy fogs, which is impossible with the present crooked main channel. It would also reduce the length of the channel to deep water from 15⅞ to 10½ miles, and thus make a gain of nearly an hour at the channel rate of speed.

Mr. Chairman, when we have a harbor with sufficient water to allow vessels that want to enter the harbor to come in at any time, the commerce of the United States will be increased and the city of New York not only be benefited, but the interest of the whole country subserved. I have said all I desire to say, and will not take up the time of the committee any longer.

Mr. BURTON. One moment. I think the gentleman from New York has made no distinct proposition or offered any amendment. The subject was considered along the same line by the committee. The committee had before it three projects, one to dig out a channel 1,500 feet wide, 35 feet deep; another, 2,000 feet wide and 35 feet deep, and one for a channel of 2,000 feet wide and 40 feet deep, and we selected the second. The reasons are very briefly given in the report, if the gentleman will read it:

The reason for this conclusion is based on two facts: First, the engineers who are to take charge of the work aver that in any event they would complete a channel 35 feet in depth before seeking to obtain a further depth of 5 feet; second, the aggregate expense of first obtaining 35 feet and then independently obtaining 5 feet more would not be greater than that of obtaining 40 feet in one project. With due regard to economy, and with the aim to secure the best results with the least expense, it has seemed best to recommend that for the present only 35 feet be obtained. Incidentally it may be said that in the hearings before us it was stated that to complete this improvement would require ten years.

I think as a business proposition there is no answer to that.

Mr. CUMMINGS. I have no fault to find with the committee.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 11, page 8, after the word "dollars," the following:

"Provided, That the material to be excavated in making said channel shall be used in reclaiming the shoal dividing the channels of the east and main ship channel, and known as Romer Shoal, for the purpose of making a fortification and improving said entrance."

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Chairman, the purpose of offering this amendment, I imagine, can be readily seen from the amendment. We are about to expend an enormous sum of money for a very necessary work, and the day is not far distant when Romer Shoal, which is a sand bar dividing the two main channels at the entrance of New York Harbor, will be used as a fortification. I have many times endeavored to make the House believe that it ought to have been done before this, and there was a time during the last session of Congress when I had a fair hope that it would then be done; but the chairman of the committee discovered that it was not germane and it was ruled out. I offered it then as an amendment to the Army fortification bill. The project for fortification of Romer Shoal has been passed upon by engineers of the War Department, and if I may be permitted, I will read a few words from the report of Lieutenant-Colonel Ludlow (now a general in the Army), who was in charge of the harbor of New York, upon that scheme. He says:

The East Channel lies about midway between Coney Island and Sandy Hook, and is therefore, on the average, about 3½ miles distant from either—range fully within reach of modern ordnance, but somewhat greater than has been regarded desirable in connection with torpedo defense and the protection of the torpedo fields from interference. But this objection can be met by special means, and it is quite likely in any case that the Romer may be occupied hereafter by a suitable armament, when the objection would be entirely relieved. Furthermore, as a general proposition, since hostilities are abnormal and exceptional and commerce is habitual and constant, it seems evident that in an instance such as the most important and valuable harbor in the country, the maintenance of whose commerce is vital, the dispositions as to the channels of entrance and exit should be such as to facilitate to the utmost the movements and security of shipping, even if some disadvantage should accrue to the details of a military defense.

We are about to expend an enormous sum of money to remove the material to make this channel, and unless an amendment of this kind should prevail the ordinary course would be pursued, and the material that is excavated will be taken 12 miles to sea and there dumped in a place indicated by the War Department as a dumping ground.

Now, it is the intention of the War Department, within a very short period of time, to make this fortification, and to erect on it two turrets of the German pattern, which shall contain two 16-inch guns, which, it is estimated, will be equivalent to the largest fleet that could be assembled in New York Harbor, making it impossible for any hostile naval fleet to enter therein.

The maintenance of the two turrets would be infinitesimal. There would be no firemen needed, no coal supply, no officers in charge of the vessels, no subalterns or crew, but simply an ordinary guard detailed from the forts in that harbor in a time of peace, not a sinkable floating arrangement as is provided for in vessels, and there will be no dry docking necessary for it. Why take this material to sea and dump it there, possibly to return some day with the returning tide, when with less expense it might be dumped on this bar and made use of at once? The crib work that would be erected to retain it would in itself make a breakwater or abutment around which the tide would wash, which would assist in keeping the channel open and possibly make it unnecessary to re-dig it.

Mr. CUMMINGS. Would it make the fishing good? [Laughter.]

Mr. FISCHER. Not having indulged in that pastime at that place, I can not say. It is absolutely necessary that the work should be done aside from the fortifications, to keep the channel open, as was the work which was done at the mouth of the Mississippi River. This crib work, this abutment, will do the work that was there found to be so efficacious.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. MITCHELL. I ask that the gentleman's time be extended five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. FISCHER. On this arrangement I wish to speak of the light-house which might be erected on it at a very small cost, a light tower or framework, which shall contain a light for the purpose of warning seamen who enter and make their way out of that channel. There could also be maintained there, it is claimed, a fog signal to warn vessels in time of bad weather. Last year, a few days after this proposition was before the House, there were four partial shipwrecks on Romer Shoal; and if this system of light-house and fog signal had been erected and maintained, possibly neither of these groundings would have occurred. The system of fog horn and lights at Sandy Hook are only used as ranges, and serve no other purpose. Were a light-house and fog signal on the edge of the channel it would do much more good and would provide every safeguard to navigation in time of storm, and I hope the House, in the interest of economy, will save this material, which would otherwise be wasted, and aid this necessary improvement, which must be done sooner or later.

Mr. McCLELLAN. Would it not be much cheaper to dispose of the material by placing it on Romer Shoal instead of taking it out to sea? Would that not save time as well as expense?

Mr. FISCHER. I think there is very little doubt that at least 3 cents per cubic yard would be saved to the Government if the material were dumped there rather than being carried out to sea. Towing and scowage would be saved.

Mr. FOOTE. About what would be the saving? It would be quite a large amount, would it not?

Mr. FISCHER. There would be a saving to the Government of at least $200,000.

Mr. CUMMINGS. They could dump at least six loads where now they dump one.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, it seems to me very inappropriate that in a bill making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors and, among other things, providing for digging channels, we should be asked to designate specifically where the dredged material shall be placed. That is a matter which should be left absolutely to the discretion of the Engineer Department. We can not control it here.

I do not think we ought to undertake to bind the discretion of the engineers as to where they shall put their material. I ask gentlemen to observe what this proposition would mean. Here is a channel about 10 miles long, and under such a provision as this the engineers might be compelled to carry the sand, or whatever other material may be taken from the bottom of the channel, 10 miles, when otherwise they would be obliged to carry it only a quarter of a mile and dump it into the open sea.

But the main objection to the proposition is that it is absolutely out of place for us to undertake to control the discretion of the Executive Department in a matter of this kind. Let the Military Committee take up this question if they wish to do so.

Allow me to add that in suggesting this improvement the Engineering Department having in charge the deepening of this channel has consulted carefully those having in charge the fortifications of the harbor, and I have no doubt that without any attempted direction on our part they will do what is best.

Mr. FISCHER. I desire to modify the amendment so as to provide that the War Department may use the whole or any portion of this material in their discretion.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think we ought to interfere at all with the exercise of their discretion. They will use the whole if they ought to do so. The gentleman, if he thinks it necessary, had better go to the War Department about this matter. Whatever is proper under the circumstances I have no doubt the Engineering Department will do.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. FISCHER as modified, it was rejected; there being—ayes 29, noes 85.

Mr. GARDNER. I move to amend by inserting the paragraph which I send to the Clerk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Absecon Inlet, New Jersey, according to the plan submitted by the Board of Engineers January 21, 1898, $10,000: Provided, That a contract or contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such material and work as may be necessary for the completion of the improvement according to said plan, to be paid as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $500,000, including the amount hereby appropriated.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I hope there is no danger of this provision passing. This matter was carefully considered by the committee when the delegation concerned was present, and I may state it was unanimously voted down.

The amendment was not agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Gowanus Creek Channel, New York: Continuing improvement, $25,000.

Mr. FISCHER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars" in the paragraph just read insert:
"Improving Bay Ridge and Red Hook and Buttermilk channels, New York: Continuing improvement, $100,000.

Mr. FISCHER. Mr. Chairman, this improvement was provided for to a very slight extent in the last river and harbor bill; but I find that in this bill the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has failed to provide for it at all. These are very important channels, taking in all the east side of the harbor of New York from Bay Ridge, or Owls Head, to the Battery. The work thus far completed makes a channel 800 feet wide and 26 feet deep up to and including Red Hook Point, and beyond that the channel is 400 feet wide and 26 feet deep.

Only the day before yesterday a steamer, having loaded at one of the docks in Brooklyn, proceeded on its passage for Europe; but reaching as far as Buttermilk Channel it grounded and remained there for two days, until the wind shifted from the north to the south and allowed sufficient water to come in on the next flood tide to float the vessel off. Without the improvement of these channels almost the entire dockage front along the Brooklyn shore from Owls Head to the foot of Hamilton avenue becomes valueless.

The committee, I understand, agree that these channels are important, but have come to the conclusion that because they are recommending so much for the main entrance to New York Harbor all the inner portions of the harbor should wait for their improvement until "the sweet by and by," if you please. I hope the amendment will be adopted.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I think a point of order lies upon this amendment. There is no estimate for it. By the river and harbor act of 1896 we made a very generous provision——

Mr. FISCHER. I contend that the point of order comes too late.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will state to the gentleman from Ohio that under the rules a point of order, to be entertained, must be made immediately after the amendment has been read, and before the debate commences.

Mr. BURTON. Very well; then let us take this amendment up on its merits. By the river and harbor act of 1896 very generous provision was made to broaden this channel. I read from that act:

Improving Bay Ridge Channel, the triangular area between Bay Ridge and Red Hook channels and Red Hook and Buttermilk channels, in the harbor of New York, N. Y.: Continuing improvement, $200,000: Provided, That the work shall be begun at the southerly end of Bay Ridge Channel and continue through it and the others, in the order named, until each, as the work advances northerly, is completed in turn, so that each shall have a uniform mean low-water depth of 26 feet and width as recommended for each: And provided, That out of said sum $5,000 shall be expended in dredging Gowanus Channel from Percival street to Hamilton Avenue Bridge: And provided further, That contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for the completion of the whole of said work, to be paid for as appropriations may be made from time to time by law, not exceeding in the aggregate $637,300, exclusive of the amount herein and heretofore appropriated.

So, Mr. Chairman, it appears that about $837,300 has been appropriated since 1896 for this work. Further than that, from an extended examination of the report, it appears that a balance was available on the 1st day of July, 1898, for the improvement of this channel, of $159,911.50.

I do not think, except in very unusual cases, which rarely occur, that we ought to make provision in two successive river and harbor bills for continuing contracts. We have done so in but one single instance in the bill, to which I have already referred, and where the circumstances made it absolutely essential.

In addition to that, I suggest to the gentleman from New York that in the great harbor of that city the most important provision, the most important feature, is to finish the main channel and get that work done first.

If there was a business man whose attention was called to the matter and was asked to consider it, he would say, beyond all reasonable question, let us first complete the work on the main channel. That is the important work. After that we can take up these other matters.

Mr. FISCHER. Let me ask the gentleman from Ohio if his opinion would be changed if this were a meritorious work?

Mr. BURTON. Oh, I do not doubt that this is a meritorious work. But the question is whether we shall not, in the first place, perform the more important work, and afterwards take up work of this kind.

Mr. FISCHER. Does the gentleman know the present depth of the channel up to New York?

Mr. BURTON. I do.

Mr. FISCHER. Why not make it uniform up to the wharves of the city? Under the present arrangement, through the channel to which I refer, the steamers beyond a certain draft can not enter at all.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. DRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of making a single remark on this question.

I most heartily indorse the amendment proposed by my colleague from New York [Mr. FISCHER]. I think it is very much more important, as a question relating to the commerce of that city, than the mere expenditure of the sum of $100,000 as proposed. There has been a provision in the river and harbor bill for an estimate as to the cost of removing two reefs which are a menace to navigation. I mean the Diamond Reef, and the Coenties Reef. These are still in existence, and the work of their removal is of supreme importance. We know that it will be almost impossible to get an appropriation to remove them in the present bill. And so it seems absolutely essential that this Buttermilk Channel, by which they may be avoided, should be improved in accordance with the amendment of my colleague.

The importance of the matter is shown by the fact that vessels coming down East River from the Brooklyn Navy-Yard pass these obstructions. They must go around Governors Island and come in close proximity to the reefs to which I have referred, and their dangerous proximity is illustrated by the fact that a very short time ago the battle ship Massachusetts, coming down East River, struck on the Diamond Reef, with a result that is well known to the members of this body. This obstruction can only be avoided by digging out and improving Buttermilk Channel and making further improvements in that direction.

I therefore favor the amendment and hope that it will be adopted.

The question being taken on the amendment of Mr. FISCHER, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask unanimous consent that, beginning on page 12, line 5, and extending to page 14, in line 13, we may pass over that portion of the bill until we have concluded section 1. The committee will have some amendments to offer.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Ohio?

There was no objection.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill, and read as follows:

Improving Galveston Ship Channel and Buffalo Bayou, Texas: For improvement of the Galveston Ship Channel and Buffalo Bayou, by dredging or otherwise, from the jetties at Galveston, Tex., up through the present ship channel and Buffalo Bayou to the proposed harbor site at Houston, Tex., to be provided by the citizens of Houston, $250,000: Provided, That out of said sum a suitable dredge may be constructed for said work.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. It is very much to be regretted that any gentleman who refuses his approbation to certain provisions of the bill and expresses his disapproval to the House finds himself in the position of being condemned by those who favor the bill. Certain gentlemen seem to feel it incumbent upon them to charge him with ignorance, with no knowledge of the subject, and constantly make misstatements in reference to his position on a particular subject.

I stated a little while since, in connection with the pending provision, that a gentleman did undertake a few years ago to navigate what is known as this "highway of commerce," Buffalo Bayou, and ran his boat into a bank, while the opposite end—the stern—stuck in the opposite bank of the stream, when trying to get around some of these circuitous points in this great highway of commerce. At once the statement was challenged. A gentleman told me—who I think is a member of the committee—that he had himself navigated the stream and knew what he was talking about. I think it entirely probable, because I read in the report of the engineers that in order to make this stream navigable for boats 162 feet long they have been compelled "to cut away two points that projected into the current of the stream."

Now, Mr. Chairman, the longest boat that last year navigated this river, according to the report of the engineers, is 162 feet long. There are 112 boats on that stream. They vary in length from 20 to 162 feet, and in tonnage from 2½ to 358. The total number of trips made by these vessels was 3,525, and if the report is true that 160,000 tons were borne upon that stream, they carried an average tonnage of 48 tons each. That is the class of vessels navigating that river. They have 10 feet of water now, and yet, according to this report, no boat has been there that draws more than 6½ feet of water. Yet here is a project to expend on that stream, which is a little over 50 miles long, $4,000,000. Already the sum of $210,000 has been expended upon it.

Now, Mr. Chairman, 160,000 tons have been borne on this great highway of commerce annually. The average cost of moving freight by rail in the United States is a little less than eight-tenths of a cent per mile. The whole cost of moving all this freight from Houston to Galveston would have been $128,000 a year. The money that has already been expended there, with the $4,000,000 at 4 per cent interest, would yield $168,000 a year. The total cost of moving that freight, as shown by the report, would be $132,000.

Mr. WALKER of Massachusetts. One hundred and sixty-eight thousand dollars a year?

Mr. HEPBURN. Yes. The Government could have moved gratuitously all this freight, every pound of it, and saved more than $40,000 a year, rather than go into this project, if its money is worth 4 per cent per annum. Then, in addition to that, the engineers report that it will cost $100,000 annually for maintenance, so that instead of going into this improvement, it is better for the Government to move all the freights that are reported, every pound free, for the people who use this river, and thereby save $140,000 a year.

Mr. KELLEY. For how many years?

Mr. HEPBURN. Every year.

Mr. KELLEY. How long will it hold good?

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not know. I am basing my estimates on what appears to be the commerce of to-day. I assume that the commerce will not grow any greater, because the water that they have to-day is not used. They only use vessels drawing 6 feet 5 inches, while they have 10 feet of water there. They could have very much larger vessels if there was a commerce demanding their presence.

I assume that the 160,000 tons reported here is the maximum of the commerce of that place that will seek an outlet.

Now, here are some facts and figures that appear. I am not ignorant about this matter, unless the engineers are ignorant. I am basing what I have said upon what they have said, and upon calculations that are simple and that each gentleman can make for himself.

[Here the hammer fell.]

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Channel from Galveston Harbor to Texas City, Tex.: The Secretary of War is hereby authorized to enter into a contract or contracts with A. B. Wolvin, or any other persons or corporations agreeing to do the work, to dredge a channel 100 feet wide at the bottom and 25 feet deep between the points above named, at a cost not to exceed $250,000, of which amount $100,000 shall be paid whenever an engineer, to be designated by the Secretary of War for that purpose, shall report that said channel, with a depth of 21 feet and of the width named above, has been obtained, and the remainder of the contract price shall be paid when the whole work is completed as herein authorized, upon a further report from an engineer to be designated for that purpose.

Mr. BURTON. The committee have an amendment to that section, which I will ask to have read at the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 25, page 19, after the word "purpose," the following: "Provided, That nothing shall be done in pursuance of this project without a further examination of the advisability thereof and a further report thereon, and as to the maintenance of said channel when finished, at a reasonable cost."

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to offer an amendment, proposing that the entire section be stricken out, and this substituted.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman offer it as an amendment to the amendment?

Mr. HAWLEY. I offer it as a substitute for the entire paragraph.

The CHAIRMAN. Then the Chair will state to the gentleman that that would not be in order until the paragraph is perfected. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The amendment was agreed to.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will now read the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause an examination and such survey as may be necessary to be made to determine the feasibility and cost of dredging a channel from Galveston Harbor to Texas City, Tex., the same to be 100 feet wide at the bottom and 25 feet deep between the points above named, the advisability of said improvement, and report the same to Congress as soon as practicable.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Chairman, the amendment which the gentleman from Ohio proposes is, in effect, that which has been offered as a substitute. In other words, if the amendment which he offers is correct, it should have been embodied in this bill instead of the paragraph which they have ingrafted in the bill. The gentleman in reply to me, at the close of the general debate, said that if I wanted this out of the bill it should be taken out. He also said that an engineer had told him that this was a practical proposition.

I notice that he says in the close of his report that "under the existing law a report must first be made as to the feasibility of the improvement." I do not intend that he shall say to this House that if I want this out it shall go out until he has answered, under what parliamentary status—under which he might say much respecting another proposition affecting the life and development of the commerce in Texas, that this has never had one single line of recommendation, and there is not in the River and Harbor Committee to-day one single word in favor of this project, under the very law which he cites here, as being the reason before an examination of a board of engineers shall be undertaken and made by the engineers. I would like for him to answer this in particular.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question for information?

Mr. HAWLEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Are both of these points in your Congressional district?

Mr. HAWLEY. Both of which points?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Both of the points named in the paragraph, namely, Galveston and Texas City.

Mr. HAWLEY. They are both in my district. And notwithstanding the fact, Mr. Chairman, that they are in my district, and notwithstanding the further fact that the engineer in charge of that district and the Secretary of War have never been asked authoritatively to say one word upon this question, neither have I ever been asked to say whether this was practicable, whether it was right, whether the commerce there needed it or not. I have been completely ignored, and that may be the practice now and the practice hereafter of the River and Harbor Committee, and I waive that.

It is not material to me that they should not have consulted my wishes or my judgment on this question, but it is material to know that, either under the advice or judgment of the Engineer Corps of the United States Army, which would give a dispassionate judgment in this case, and how it would affect the great harbor of Galveston, on which the gentleman has said $8,000,000 has been expended, to increase the commerce with the great West and our entire country may be influenced and unfavorably affected by its construction.

I want him to say to this House what he knows about what disposition will be made of the 3,000,000 cubic yards of earth which will come out of the channel to be dug, and if he knows whether it will wash into Galveston Harbor and there increase enormously the expense of this Government in keeping that harbor clear for the use of the commerce of this country. I want him to tell us what it will cost to maintain this channel, and if, in fact, he knows anything about the question except what was said to him by a persuasive gentleman from Cleveland, Ohio, one of the beneficiaries in this case.

It seems to me that it would have been fair at least to the Treasury of the United States for him, in his high place, to have inquired what the Engineer Corps of the United States think about the practicability of this proposition. I disagree with my distinguished friend from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] in that part of his speech referring to another item of this bill. There is a provision in this bill that proposes to dig a channel to the city of Houston.

How practicable it may be, how effective it may be for caring for the commerce of that great city I refer him to the engineers of the United States Army. They have reported favorably on it. They have said what it would cost. It is said that the whole commerce carried could be transported to Galveston for $132,000 of expense. They receive more cotton there than at any interior point in the United States, and in the shipment of cotton alone the freight is more than half a million dollars.

Yet the same sum has been allotted to this enterprise that has been appropriated for Texas City Channel without one single word from the Engineer Corps of our country commending the work as practicable or advisable. I ask the House to know, before it appropriates this money, what the engineers say about it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, if the amendment put on this provision is a proper one—and I assume it must be, coming from the committee—then this entire paragraph ought to be stricken out of this bill. What is the propriety of proceeding to appropriate $250,000 or any other sum of money upon a project that has not yet received the sanction of the War Department and the very initial information we are now seeking for? Let us see what the practical effect of that sort of legislation will be. Without knowing what the project is to cost, or knowing whether or not it can be maintained, we put into the bill and make provision for the expenditure of the money, and then stop and wait for a report and investigation, and in that way get rid of the jurisdiction of Congress to say whether the work shall proceed or not. In other words, you make your appropriation first, in plain violation of the entire practice of Congress, and then you say, "Now, we will get this information before it shall proceed."

Now, who is to determine whether that information justifies the procedure or not? The information that comes may show that it is an unworthy project and ought not to be appropriated for. Who is to determine it? If it is to be left to Congress, strike out the paragraph and get your information and then come to Congress with the information.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Chairman, I asked the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY] whether or not these two points were in his Congressional district for the purpose of satisfying my own mind whether or not there was any discrimination on his part against any other district; but when I found that both these points are in his own district, and his district is to be benefited by the appropriation, if at all, it seems to me, when he says he does not desire it, that that almost ought to be conclusive upon this Congress.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, since the gentleman from Texas has seen fit to make a sort of personal attack on me, I desire to say a few words. He complains that he has been ignored. He has not been ignored, for he introduced himself the resolution asking for a report upon the expense of making this improvement, and in that resolution asked for no report upon the advisability thereof. I take it for granted that when a member of this House takes advantage of his privilege as a member to introduce a bill he means what that act imports, and I do not take the time, nor do members of the committee take the time, to go around and ask him, "Did you mean it, or was there something evasive in what you did?"

I understand he was requested to introduce the resolution partly by persons of his own district and partly by persons outside. Now, as I stated to the House when the matter was brought up and the question was raised by the gentleman from Missouri [Mr. DOCKERY], I noticed that there was no provision for a report on the advisability, but the committee knew something of that project. What we knew of it already was this: That the city of Galveston had inefficient means for handling the freight that accumulated there; that whatever freight accumulated was subject to payment of enormous wharfage charges.

The Government had expended $8,000,000, the benefit of which was only partially obtained. The whole committee thought this a good solution of that question, and I want to say to the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] that $250,000 for the channel to Houston does not commit the House, or this committee, to the expenditure of $4,000,000 there. Something must be done to utilize the large expenditure of money in that locality, and in the line of the question asked by the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH], I want to say that it is not a question for Galveston or the Congressional district. It is a question for the numerous States and thousands of miles of railway tributary to that locality seeking an outlet at the Gulf.

Several gentlemen of the committee had a conversation with engineers or obtained other information, and we found there had been a channel dug there to a depth of 14 or 15 feet, and it had done no injury to the jetties at Galveston. There was no indication that any injury would be done in that way. This came up in this manner: There was then a doubt in the committee as to whether we could in such cases make appropriation. The question arose, in the first instance, on Sabine Pass, on page 21 of the bill. Some members of the committee, and I among the others, having no estimate before us, thought we could not make any provision for it. The majority of the committee thought otherwise, and took the ground that whenever we had a specific estimate before us we could make an appropriation in this bill, that it was a part of our prerogative.

What we need in order to bring anything into the bill is to know as to the expense; we do not need a recommendation from the engineer, but we do need knowledge as to the probable cost. Several of the older members of the committee took the ground that, having knowledge as to the amount required at Sabine Pass, we were authorized to make the appropriation, although it was only in the form of a letter from the local engineer to the Chief Engineer. The status of the appropriation for the channel to Texas City is precisely the same as that for Sabine Pass.

I wish to say, however, in view of the discussion that has arisen here, that while I question whether the opposition to this project does not arise from a desire to benefit Galveston and Brazos City rather than to diminish the commercial facilities of that part of the country, I am unwilling this clause should stay in the bill if the gentleman from the district immediately concerned thinks that it should be stricken out. It is a question which he must settle with his own constituents, not a question for me. I therefore make the motion that this whole clause be stricken out. [Applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the substitute offered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY]. The vote on that comes before the vote on the motion of the gentleman in charge of the bill to strike out the entire paragraph.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I rise to a parliamentary inquiry. Will not the adoption of the motion of the gentleman from Texas have the same effect as the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Ohio? The motion of the gentleman from Texas is to strike out the paragraph and insert another calling for some information.

The CHAIRMAN. The substitute is offered, as the Chair understands, to perfect the paragraph.

Mr. BURTON. It seems to me, Mr. Chairman, that the provision embraced in the proposed substitute would come in more properly at the end of the bill, in the section with regard to surveys. I do not think this provision should come in here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will say to the gentleman in charge of the bill that this substitute has been offered to perfect the pending paragraph of the bill. No point of order was made against it when it was read, and debate has been had upon it. The only way it can be disposed of now is by a vote.

Mr. DOCKERY. We can vote it down.

The CHAIRMAN. That is the privilege of the gentleman if he can secure a sufficient number of members to aid him. [Laughter.]

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. HAWLEY, it was rejected.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is now on the motion of the gentleman in charge of the bill, that the pending paragraph be stricken out.

The motion was agreed to.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to give notice that I shall offer my proposed substitute as an amendment to be inserted in the closing part of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Sabine Pass, Texas and Louisiana: For straightening, widening, and otherwise improving the main ship channel, Sabine Pass, Texas and Louisiana, by the removal of the oyster reefs, mud flats, and other material between a point 1,000 feet north of the United States life-saving station and a point opposite the United States light-house, $50,000.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I wish to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. BURTON] upon what point in the Pass this limitation operates?

Mr. BURTON. The upper part, above that which is improved under continuing appropriations in accordance with projects already existing.

Mr. GROSVENOR. It extends the channel higher up?

Mr. BURTON. Yes, sir.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving outer harbor at Michigan City, Ind.: The unexpended balance on hand may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be expended in improving said harbor according to the latest approved project.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out all of lines 18, 19, 20, and 21, on page 23, and insert the following: "Improving outer harbor at Michigan City, Ind.: The Secretary of War may, in his discretion, modify the existing project in accordance with the recommendations contained in the report of the board of engineers under date of March 6, 1897, and expend the balance on hand from previous appropriations to the improvement of said harbor according to the project so modified."

Mr. BURTON. As I understand, this amendment is designed to make the paragraph more specific by including certain modifications made by the Board of Engineers in the previous plan.

Mr. CRUMPACKER. That is the purpose of the amendment—to make the provision a little more specific—to remove a possible obscurity. The text of the paragraph provides that the balance on hand may be expended in improving the harbor "according to the latest approved project."

Now, it is doubtful whether, strictly speaking, it can be said that the project has been approved. The Secretary of War appointed a board of engineers to investigate the conditions at Michigan City, and the board reported certain modifications of the plan. The appropriations standing to the credit of that improvement were not expended because the officers in charge awaited the action of Congress authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to expend the money on the improvement according to the modified plan.

The project has not yet been approved; and I desire that the Secretary of War be authorized to approve the modified plan, so that the balance standing to the credit of the improvement may be expended in carrying out the work according to the plan as modified. This amendment makes no change in the text except to make it more specific. It particularizes more than the original provision, which, I have had some fear, might be so ambiguous that the Secretary of War would hardly be able to know what he should do under it. That is the only purpose of the amendment.

Mr. BURTON. I think there is no ambiguity in the provision as it stands in the bill. The language is, "the latest approved project," which means, of course, the one submitted to the War Department and approved by it. Still I see no objection to the adoption of the amendment.

The question being taken, the amendment of Mr. CRUMPACKER was adopted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Milwaukee, Wis.: For maintenance, $14,000.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "dollars," in line 16, page 29, insert "improving the harbor of South Milwaukee, Wis., $10,000."

Mr. BURTON. I make the point of order on that amendment.

Mr. OTJEN. What point does the gentleman make?

The CHAIRMAN. Will the gentleman from Ohio state his question of order?

Mr. BURTON. There is no estimate for the appropriation at all, as far as I am aware, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, the engineer in charge says the estimated amount to complete the harbor is $133,000. Five thousand dollars was appropriated to be expended on the continuation of the work two years ago, and this is an amendment intended to continue that work.

South Milwaukee is 7 miles distant from the city of Milwaukee. South Milwaukee contains a population of between four and five thousand people; it has 17 factories, and has only one railroad upon which to depend for its transportation. Last year the imports and the exports of the city amounted to 126,000 tons, nearly, valued at $2,250,000.

These people are intensely interested in the question of this harbor improvement. They have been asking for it for a long time, because it is a matter of urgent importance, a matter of vital necessity, in fact, to them. It would be of immense benefit to the city, and of great convenience to the people there, if they could have lake facilities as well as the rail transportation which is now afforded. And I hope that this small amount of $10,000 which is asked for in this amendment will be accepted by the committee and that the chairman of the committee will not object to the consideration, at least, of the proposition and let the House pass upon its merits.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I find there was an estimate in 1896, but it is entirely omitted from the memorandum book which is now before us; and, further than that, I would state that the gentleman never called my attention or the attention of the committee, so far as I know, to the necessity of making this appropriation at a time when we could have considered the propriety of inserting it in the bill.

We have dealt liberally, let me say, however, with Milwaukee and with the State of Wisconsin generally. A very large amount of the appropriation already made has been unexpended, and it is not desirable to make any further addition to the amount already available at that point. This is particularly true because of the fact that the gentleman has not seen fit to call the attention of the committee to the necessity for the appropriation he now submits his amendment for.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely mistaken. I appeared before the committee and urged strenuously that this appropriation should be made.

Mr. BURTON. Before the committee?

Mr. OTJEN. Yes, before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I especially mentioned the harbor at South Milwaukee, and my colleague from Wisconsin, a member of the committee, asked the question whether this city had any other facility except that afforded by the one railroad. You will no doubt remember that?

Mr. BURTON. I do not remember whether I was present at the meeting the gentleman refers to or not. The members of the House, however, were asked generally to present their claims and the necessity for the improvements in their various sections, and in this case I certainly have no recollection that the gentleman did so.

Mr. OTJEN. The matter was presented before the committee.

Mr. COOPER of Wisconsin. Mr. Chairman, I will state the reason why there was no appropriation made for the harbor at South Milwaukee. It was because we find in the Book of Estimates that the engineers make no estimate or no recommendation for the work, and the committee made no appropriation because of that fact.

I have not the Book of Estimates before me, but I think, if my recollection is accurate, that this was the condition with reference to that harbor. There is a lengthy report upon the subject, however.

I think myself that there is a sufficient amount of commerce at the harbor in question to justify an appropriation. I know the committee did not put it into the bill or allow the appropriation because of the fact that the engineers did not ask for it. That is all there is of it. But during the progress of the hearings this statement from the Chief of Engineers was read:

REMARKS.

In its present condition the harbor of South Milwaukee is of no benefit to general commerce. That any material and lasting benefit may be derived it is necessary that both piers be extended to the length called for by the present project and a channel dredged between them.

The estimated cost of completion of present project (see report of Chief of Engineers, 1895, page 2043) is $133,000.

But yet in our Book of Estimates the engineer, as I said before, did not ask for any. I think myself, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman from Milwaukee [Mr. OTJEN] is justified, however, in making this motion. If I had been in the Engineer Department I should have recommended an appropriation for this harbor.

Mr. OTJEN. I presume that the reason why the engineers did not make a specific estimate is that they indicated to the committee that it would require $133,000 to complete this harbor. The committee could then judge how much money they saw fit to give toward the improvement of this harbor. As these harbors are improved from time to time in piecemeal, it seems to me that this small sum of $10,000 ought to be allowed toward the improvement of this project.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state to the gentleman in charge of the bill [Mr. BURTON] that, in the opinion of the Chair, the point made that it is not germane is not well taken, and the Chair will overrule that; and if there is no further debate, the Chair will put the motion.

Mr. BURTON. One further point, Mr. Chairman. I find further in the report for 1897 this statement:

The present piers, built by private parties, are of such inferior construction as to be unfit to form any portion of the permanent improvement.

Now, this is of a piece with a great many requests brought before us, and its refusal is in the line of what the committee has been doing. The War Department substantially say that unless $133,000 is appropriated there no permanent benefit will result. What is the use of giving $10,000 there?

I want to say that in past bills—and I will not name any one—we have had too much of that sort of thing, and I trust that, as far as possible, the House will depart from that old idea of appropriating a little, enabling the Government to build a little piece of a pier or a little piece of a breakwater, and then, before another appropriation is made, letting the waves wash it away, although somebody in the district gets recognition and it is thought to be a good thing to do.

Mr. OTJEN. In reply to that, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. FARIS. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee [Mr. BURTON] a question relative to this. I understood the gentleman from Wisconsin, when he was on the floor a few minutes ago, to say that after this estimate of $133,000 was made by certain engineers there was appropriated toward the improvement the sum of $5,000, which has been expended.

Mr. OTJEN. That is correct. Two years ago the Government entered upon the prosecution of this work.

Mr. FARIS. From the fact that this money has not been asked for, it seems to be developed that there is a misunderstanding relative to this appropriation. The chairman of the committee says he thinks we ought to be cautious about it, and another gentleman on the committee, familiar with the facts, says that if the engineers had asked for it, he would have recommended the appropriation for the continuation of this improvement. I certainly think the gentleman from Wisconsin should not be taken advantage of by reason of the fact that there has been a misunderstanding among the members of the committee in regard to this proposition.

Mr. BARNEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Milwaukee [Mr. OTJEN] what was done with that $5,000? That is, if it was used for the beginning of that project, the cost of which was estimated to be something over $100,000.

Mr. OTJEN. That was expended in extending one of the piers. The entire amount has been expended in extending one of the piers of this harbor.

Mr. BARNEY. If that is true, then the criticism of the chairman of the committee that there is nothing there to work upon would not be true, for they have already started out with the expenditure of $5,000.

Mr. OTJEN. They built about 200 feet of pier with that $5,000, and in answer to what the chairman of the committee [Mr. BURTON] has said regarding a part of the pier built by private citizens, that cuts no figure, because the Government engineer estimated that that work would have to be done over again, and is included in their general estimate of costs of this harbor. In reply to the statement that it would take $133,000 to complete this, I will say that I should be very glad to have the full amount; but I have only asked this $10,000 so as to continue this work and eventually get this harbor for these people. They certainly are extremely anxious to have it.

Mr. REEVES. Mr. Chairman, by reference to the Report of the Chief of Engineers, part 1, for 1898, speaking of this harbor, the following statement will be found:

During the past fiscal year the north pier has been extended 185 feet. The improvement of this harbor is not yet far enough advanced to make it of any value for purposes of navigation and commerce.

Now, there is no question, Mr. Chairman, but what the status of this project is such that an appropriation can lawfully be made if we want to do it; but the truth is, that the Engineer Department do not recognize it as of sufficient value to recommend it. The custom of the engineers in these reports is that where a project of this character or any other character is before them, and they state the amount necessary to complete it, if it is deemed advisable to go on with it, they also state how much can be profitably used during the next ensuing year.

But if in their judgment it ought not to be gone on with, they omit that statement. They have done it in this case. Now, the truth is, this harbor stands upon the same footing as perhaps a hundred others for which the Corps of Engineers are unwilling to recommend that we go on with appropriation.

Mr. OTJEN. Mr. Chairman, if I understand the gentlemen means to say that the engineers do not consider that a proper harbor can be constructed there, then he is certainly mistaken. I admit that this $10,000 will not complete this harbor so as to make it useful for commerce, because it will require more, but whenever that amount is expended by the engineers there will be quite a serviceable harbor there. There is no question about that fact. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving harbor at Humboldt, Cal.: Continuing improvement, by dredging in the inner harbor, $35,000.

Mr. BARLOW. Mr. Chairman, I want to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 5, the following:

"Improving Wilmington Harbor, California, in accordance with project submitted February 17, 1895, $50,000: Provided, That contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such material and work as may be necessary to complete such project, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $342,000, exclusive of the amount herein appropriated."

Mr. BARLOW. Mr. Chairman, the improvement of Wilmington Harbor was commenced in 1871 by the Government. They have expended on it up to date $952,853.43. Although nothing has been done there since 1894, in the river and harbor act of 1896 this very same provision that I have now offered was passed; but in another paragraph of the act there was a provision that in the location of the deep-water harbor out there, in the contingency that a certain location was chosen, then this other paragraph should be stricken out. The selection of San Pedro site wiped out this improvement for the inner harbor of Wilmington.

The Board of Engineers report that in view of the wiping out of that provision they could not recommend further appropriation for the inner harbor at Wilmington without legislation similar to that in the river and harbor act of 1896. Without improving the inner harbor the great benefits to be derived from the $1,300,000 expended in the outer harbor or harbor of refuge can not be made use of by the shipping interests of the coast to its entire and full extent. I hope that the act of 1896 as it was passed will be now inserted, so that the work can go on there and that the shipping on the coast may get the full benefit of the improvement of a deep-water harbor.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to raise the point of order that there is no survey or estimate.

Mr. BARLOW. Oh, yes; there is.

Mr. BURTON. There was a provision in the river and harbor act of 1896.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, will the gentleman allow me just here at this point, not in reference to the point of order raised here, but I understand, Mr. Chairman, and I think I am correctly advised—and I do not intend anything I may say as having any relation to the point of order pending—the river and harbor bill is not a general appropriation bill, and it is not subject to the points of order that apply to general appropriation bills, because in the very nature of things a river and harbor bill is legislation itself.

The CHAIRMAN. It has been so held repeatedly by previous Chairmen.

Mr. DOCKERY. I am interested in that, because there is a repealing clause that comes later, and I do not want it to go out on a point of order.

Mr. BARLOW. I do not think that a point of order could apply here, now that the Government has already expended $950,000 on this improvement, and this is a recommendation of $392,000 more, simply as a continuation of that plan upon which over $950,000 has already been expended.

Mr. BURTON. This is entirely new to me, because it has not been presented.

The CHAIRMAN. Before the gentleman proceeds, the Chair desires to say that as to the point of order, even if it were well taken, it came too late, because after the amendment was read, without any objection from the gentleman in charge of the bill, the gentleman from California proceeded to discuss his amendment; and a point of order, to be well taken under the rules, must be made as soon as the amendment is read by the Clerk and placed before the committee and before any discussion commences.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And, in addition to what the Chair has said, and in which I quite agree, no point of order can be made to a paragraph of this bill because of some defect in the manner in which the item has come here.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair stated in answer to a question put by the gentleman from Missouri that, for the last sixteen years at least, it has been held in the consideration of these river and harbor bills that they are not general appropriation bills, and that the rule that applies to an appropriation bill does not apply when we have under consideration a river and harbor bill.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I understand that. In addition to that, there seems to be an opinion here that a point of order made against a paragraph raises the question of the report of the engineers.

The CHAIRMAN. Ah!

Mr. GROSVENOR. Certainly that can not be done. It is a ground for the committee to withdraw it or to strike it out, or anything of that sort.

Mr. BURTON. I would like to ask the gentleman from California [Mr. BARLOW] why it was that they inserted a provision for a survey? There appears to have been a survey provided for, and if the project was under way, why was there such a provision?

Mr. BARLOW. The recommendation of the engineer for $392,000 provides for the deepening of the water from 18 feet to 22 feet, and the further recommendation for a survey was as to the cost or estimate for a depth of 25 to 30 feet.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I trust the House will not consider this amendment favorably. We are somewhat familiar with the controversy between the two harbors on the Pacific coast, Santa Monica and San Pedro, which has raised a good deal of dust abont fighting a monopoly for either harbor and rejecting the other. What I think this House ought to have done was to have omitted any provision for either. Let them settle their unseemly scrapping and let it first become manifest that there is a need of a deep-water harbor at an expense of $3,000,000.

Here was a place where provision has been made for $100,000 for the outer harbor and a further amount not to exceed $2,900,000, making $3,000,000. There is no commerce there, and is not likely to be at present. That outer harbor will not be finished for years to come. When that $3,000,000 is expended, as I suppose it will be, whether a blemish on the river and harbor legislation or not, then we will talk about the inside harbor.

Mr. BARLOW. Mr. Chairman, I want to correct a statement of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON].

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair desires to state that debate is closed on this amendment.

Mr. BURTON. I desire that the gentleman be heard.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be permitted to speak for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. BARLOW. The statement that $3,000,000 is expended out there is not borne out by the facts.

Mr. BURTON. I did not say it had been expended; I said it would be expended.

Mr. BARLOW. Well, is to be expended. The cost of the entire contract for the outer harbor is let for $1,303,000 for the entire breakwater. A proviso was placed in the law that there should not be expended more than $2,900,000 for the entire improvement of the outer harbor, but under the contracts now let the entire expense of improvement will only cost $1,303,000. So in that view of it there is over $1,600,000 that may yet be expended there. But they are not asking that. This contract of $393,000 was authorized, and is simply a continuation of expenditure of $950,000 that has already been expended there, which has deepened the water from 2 feet on the bar to 18 feet.

The chairman of the committee says there is no commerce at that port. Does the gentleman know that that port is a port of entry for the greatest city in the Southwestern part of the United States, Los Angeles, where three transcontinental railways enter? It is in the direct line of commerce for this new trade that we are reaching out for—the trade of the Philippines. Let me tell you that when that outer harbor is complete, with the necessary accompaniment of the inner harbor, giving 25 or 30 feet for deep-water vessels, you will find Los Angeles will be, inside of ten years, the largest city on the Pacific coast. It has a commerce to-day worthy of respect.

In 1871 there was but little commerce there, and to-day the report shows an immense increase. In 1871 it was 50,000 tons; in 1897 it was 233,000 tons. In 1871 Los Angeles only had a few thousand inhabitants, and to-day it has over 125,000 inhabitants, and in the county of Los Angeles there are 250,000 inhabitants. There is no portion of this country growing like southern California.

That question of the location of the harbor has been fought out; and, thank God, it has been fought out and settled on the side of the people, and it is the first time in the history of California for many years that the people have beaten the corporations. I regret to see, Mr. Chairman, that this old question is dragged in again. I hope members will provide for this improvement of the inner harbor, as provided for in the plan submitted by Col. W. H. H. Benyaurd, of the Engineer Corps, to a depth of 25 feet, as recommended by the Engineer Corps, and as provided for by the act of 1896. It is one of the best measures that can possibly be inserted in the bill.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Chairman, I would like to inquire of the gentleman from California why $50,000 of the appropriation made for this work remains unexpended—I mean of the appropriation made in 1896?

Mr. BARLOW. As I understand it, if the gentleman wants a direct answer, it is because the Secretary of War has been opposed to it. That is the answer.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on agreeing to the amendment offered by the gentleman from California [Mr. BARLOW].

The question was taken, and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Mystic River, Massachusetts, at the mouth, $50,000, according to approved project.

Mr. BARRETT. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out the words "at the mouth" and insert "below the mouth of Island End River."

Mr. BURTON. I see no objection to that amendment.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Delaware River from Trenton to its mouth, Pennsylvania and New Jersey: Completing improvement, $300,000.

Mr. BINGHAM. I desire to move an amendment to strike out "three" and insert "five" in the paragraph just read, so as to appropriate $500,000 instead of $300,000.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to reserve a point of order on that amendment.

Mr. BINGHAM. I ask the gentleman from Ohio whether he is willing to accept this proposed amendment?

Mr. BURTON. No. Five hundred thousand dollars is a larger appropriation than we ought to make.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, the improvement of the Delaware River has been going on for about fifteen years, under appropriations by Congress and the surveys of the Engineer Department, in order that a channel of 26 feet depth might be obtained on that great highway of commerce from its mouth to the port of Philadelphia, a distance of almost 100 miles. About $3,000,000 have been expended upon the river. The city of Philadelphia, in order to facilitate the improvement so as to remove as soon as possible what has been a great bar to our commerce, has appropriated during the last three years $685,000. It was the duty of the General Government to make this appropriation, but in order to expedite the work of improvement the municipality of Philadelphia appropriated this amount. The work is now almost completed. This appropriation, if increased to $500,000, will complete for this great work all that is estimated for under the 26-foot channel surveys.

The Chief Engineer of the Army, in submitting an estimate of $300,000 for completion, predicated his estimate, as I will show, upon the supposition that the city of Philadelphia would aid by further contributions this work of the Government. Lieutenant-Colonel Raymond, in charge of the Delaware River improvement, submits in his report, page 5:

In view of the work thus provided for by the city, and the low prices for dredging obtained in the recent contracts, the estimated cost of completing the improvement from Marcushook ice piers to deep water in Delaware Bay, in accordance with the approved project, has been reduced from $305,000 to $300,000, this estimate being based on the assumption that the city of Philadelphia will complete the channel from the city to the Marcushook ice piers.

If the city of Philadelphia had not made contribution of $685,000, Congress would have been called upon to make a corresponding increase in the appropriation; and Congress would have done it, for it has appropriated for this work as a continuing project for the last fifteen years. If the Chief Engineer had made his estimate $500,000, I believe, so strongly does the merit of this project appeal, that the gentleman in charge of this bill would have approved the estimate and embodied in the bill a paragraph covering that amount.

While I recognize the fact that we can not, without a concurrent resolution of Congress, call upon the Chief Engineer of the Army to revise his estimate and resubmit, the chairman of this committee, in view of the necessity for this legislation, will not, I trust, interpose objection to the acceptance of the amendment, or at least will not so antagonize it that the House can not have full liberty, in view of the statement I have made, to pass judgment upon this proposition. It will be two years before another river and harbor bill comes before us; and unless this amendment be adopted, the channel of that river will remain to a certain extent obstructed, and it will not have the 26 feet of water which the project when completed contemplates.

We have voted this morning to make a 35-foot channel for New York Harbor. I have no objection. I think the harbor of New York needs such a channel. And the surveys submitted to Congress in the report of the Engineer show the necessity for a 30-foot channel for the River Delaware up to the harbor of Philadelphia. So, too, at Boston a similar deepening of the channel; and in view of the growing commerce of Baltimore, such an improvement is also needed there. The great ocean carriers to-day (and I have before me a statement of 33 of the great carrying vessels entering the port of New York) require, every one of them, a depth of water from twenty-eight feet and some inches up to 32 feet.

In other words, for economy of transportation the great carrying vessels demand a greater depth of water. But for what we call our tidal benefit in the Delaware River none of these vessels could enter our port. They enter it now because many of them can take advantage of two tides, the tide rise being 6 feet, giving us a greater depth in the channel of the river than the simple 26 feet. Gentlemen can understand what delay and expense the waiting for two tides inflicts upon the cost of transportation.

I trust, as this bill embraces this paragraph for "the completion" of this great work on the Delaware River, it may be made consistent in its declarations and that the $500,000 necessary for completing the work may be appropriated; for unless this be done the estimate of the engineers will not stand correct.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, this project is one of many. The question is not what the committee would like to do, but what we can do if we are to keep our appropriations within reasonable limits. This is undoubtedly a meritorious project; but if this appropriation be increased from $300,000 to $500,000, there is an appropriation on the next page that will also have to be increased from $300,000 to $500,000. There is one also for the mouth of the Mississippi that ought to be increased. At Baltimore they have a 30-foot channel, so narrow that they can not safely utilize it. At New Orleans, at the outlet of the Mississippi, they have a precarious 26 feet.

Now, the history of this appropriation has been given by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. BINGHAM]. It was expected that the $300,000 appropriated would finish the work. But $125,000 additional will be required because of the shoaling of the river at a point below Philadelphia, known as "Dan Bakers Shoal" I think, and $75,000 at a point known as "Marcus Hook," near Philadelphia.

Mr. BINGHAM. That is correct.

Mr. BURTON. This amount—the latter sum of $75,000—for the improvement of Marcus Hook was not counted in the Government estimates for the reason that it was expected the city of Philadelphia was to do that work and would appropriate the amount necessary.

Mr. BINGHAM. But it must be remembered that more than $685,000 has been expended by the city in the improvement of the river.

Mr. BURTON. That is true, I have no doubt. But permission was twice asked by the city of Philadelphia for leave to make this improvement, and it was expected that the work would be done under the supervision of the Government engineers. I ought to say, however, in all fairness, in this connection, that the city of Philadelphia has been extremely public spirited in making appropriations for such improvements. They have done a great deal of a class of work usually done by the United States Government.

But should the amendment suggested by the gentleman from Pennsylvania be adopted, it would simply destroy the harmony of the bill, and there would be no reason why the committee should object to similar amendments in other places.

I hope, therefore, that the amendment will not be insisted upon.

Mr. Chairman, there is also a parliamentary question as to whether we can appropriate more than the amount fixed in the bill. That is a point that we must consider. This is the present limit as fixed by the law.

There is a survey also, let me state, with reference to the improvement of the river at Philadelphia, which will be found on page 156 of the report, which provides for a deeper channel and is estimated to cost the sum of $5,935,000 if the improvement is carried out. Now, I fear that the modification of the appropriation, as made in the bill under the amendment of the gentleman from Pennsylvania, might be construed as committing us to the prosecution of that additional work, which I do not think the House ought to undertake or would be willing to undertake.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the consent of the committee to be permitted to insert in the RECORD the memorial to the Congress of the United States by the trade, commercial, and maritime interests of Philadelphia, who came here and urged the necessity for this appropriation. This committee had a hearing before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and I make this request in order that when the bill comes back we may have this statement in some available form for the use of the members of the House. It is not very lengthy.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania?

There was no objection.

The memorial referred to by Mr. BINGHAM is as follows:

MEMORIAL.

To the honorable the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States in Congress assembled:

The trade, commercial, and maritime interests of the city of Philadelphia respectfully petition your honorable bodies for such legislative action as will permit the early formation of a 30-foot channel in the Delaware River between the city of Philadelphia and deep water of Delaware Bay; and in justification of such a request your memorialists submit the following statements:

THE DEPENDENCE OF THE VALUES OF PRODUCTION ON TRANSPORTATION.

The problem of transportation stands next to that of production, which more than any other element has contributed to our unparalleled wealth as a nation. The value of production is so intimately dependent upon transportation that that which cheapens the latter adds to the market value of the former; and the ability to realize from our national sources of wealth becomes dependent upon the best conditions of transportation.

From the wonderful productive power of our country a current of trade flows from our shores which astonishes the world, and the wealth and welfare of each community will become proportionate to its ability to freely and economically contribute to and move in that current of trade. Every reduction in the cost of transportation broadens the extent of our markets.

While abundant pr duction coupled with the best conditions of transportation is a blessing, abundant production joined with trammeled transportation is a misfortune, since thereby the excess of production is thrown back upon the community by excessive charges for transportation, causing lower prices, and consequent loss to the producers.

COMMERCE TRIBUTARY TO THE DELAWARE RIVER.

The Delaware River is the maritime outlet of the States of Pennsylvania, Delaware, and a large part of New Jersey, comprising an area of over 54,000 square miles, with a population of nearly 7,000,000 people. The State of Pennsylvania is the center of the oil, coal, and iron products of the Atlantic slope, while the city of Philadelphia is its leading manufacturing and commercial center.

In the year 1890 Pennsylvania supplied the following percentages of the entire product of the United States for the items named: Pig iron, 49 per cent; manufactured steel, 62 per cent; manufactured iron and steel, 52 per cent; petroleum products, 60 per cent; bituminous coal, 37 per cent; anthracite coal, 100 per cent. The value of the manufactured products of the city of Philadelphia alone in 1890 was $577,000,000.

Upon the conditions of transportation between this center of production and the outside markets of the world depend the values realized from these products. The Delaware River is the extension of the Atlantic Ocean to our wharves, and thereby our access, by water transportation, with the world; and upon the proper adjustment of this arm of the sea to modern commercial demands must depend, in a large measure, our prosperity.

CHANNEL AND HARBOR DEPTHS REQUIRED BY MODERN STEAMSHIPS.

The harbors of Boston, New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore, and Norfolk cover the principal seaports of the North Atlantic coast. Thirty years ago the channels of approach to these harbors carried a natural depth of from 17 to 19 feet, except New York Harbor, which had a depth of 23 feet. At that time the dimensions of ocean carriers did not require channel and harbor depths exceeding 18 feet.

At the present time provision has been made for a 27-foot channel for Boston Harbor; New York has a 30-foot channel, which it is proposed to deepen to 35 feet; Baltimore has a 30-foot channel, and Norfolk has just completed a 29-foot channel. The channel of approach to Philadelphia Harbor through the Delaware River has a less depth than 24 feet. In other words, the Delaware River carries to-day channel depths that the other North Atlantic ports outgrew years ago and discarded as indequate for the requirements of modern ocean commerce.

If reiteration is required of the statement that modern ocean carriers demand increased channel depths, the following table of the actual draft of steamships entering New York Harbor gives emphasis to the facts previously stated:

Steamer.	Draft.	Steamer.	Draft.
	Ft. in.		Ft. in.
Kaiser Wilhelm der Grosse	28 1	Idaho	29 0
Kaiser Friederick	28 2	Minnewaska	29 0
Fürst Bismarck	28 2	Normannia	29 0
Paris	28 3	Campania	29 1
Friesland	28 4	Cevic	29 3
Bovic	28 4	Georgic	29 3
St. Paul	28 5	Phœnicia	29 3
New York	28 5	Lucania	29 6
Umbria	28 5	Cymric	30 0
Tauric	28 5	Patria	30 0
Auguste Victoria	28 5	Kensington	30 1
Etruria	28 7	Southwark	30 2
Victoria	28 8	Palatia	30 6
Alexander	28 8	Pretoria	31 6
St. Louis	28 11	Pennsylvania	32 0
America	29 0	Bulgaria	32 0
Aurania	29 0

Experience has demonstrated that the larger ships are the cheapest carriers; but it follows as a natural consequence that the larger ships have the greatest draft, and therefore their advantages can only be realized by such harbors as have sufficient depth to permit their entrance.

The competitors of the port of Philadelphia are New York on the north and Baltimore on the south. Each of these seaports has a channel of approach carrying 30 feet at low water, and they are thereby enabled to realize all the advantages arising from freight transportation in deep-draft ocean carriers.

The conditions which surrounded transportation and commerce a few years ago have become obsolete, and in their place new conditions have arisen which imperatively govern the hour. If these changed conditions can be adopted, we have a standing place in the competition for business; otherwise we are pushed aside by better equipped competitors. The principles involved in the management of the business of a seaport differ in no essential from those demanded of the individual in the conduct of his business affairs; and success in either is founded upon such a recognition of and obedience to the laws of trade as will permit the requirements of the times to be fully met. If as competitors we do not or can not comply with these demands, we are forced out of the market.

RIVER AND HARBOR IMPROVEMENTS CONSIDERED AS AN INVESTMENT.

If the appropriations made by Congress for the improvement of national waterways be considered in the light of an investment, the Government has received the following returns from the appropriations made for the improvement of the Delaware River:

In 1897 the value of the foreign commerce of the port of Philadelphia, as determined by the customs returns, was $95,406,000; the revenue collected was $13,923,000. The entire amount appropriated by the Government, from the earliest date, for the improvement of the channel of the Delaware River has been $2,972,000. From this it is seen that for each dollar appropriated for the improvement of the Delaware River by the Government over $32 in value of foreign freights passed through these channels in the single year of 1897, and that for each dollar that has been expended on its improvement the Government collected in revenues in the single year 1897 $4.70.

A similar calculation applied to the last ten years shows that the value of these foreign freights has been 312 times the total appropriations for the improvement of the river, and that the revenue collected from customs has been during the same interval of ten years over fifty-one times the total amount appropriated by the Government for the improvement of the river during the last twenty-six years.

IMPORTANCE OF DEEP-WATER CHANNEL BETWEEN THE SEA AND LEAGUE ISLAND NAVY-YARD.

Within the southern boundary of Philadelphia and at the confluence of the Schuylkill and Delaware rivers is located League Island Navy-Yard. This naval station has a frontage of over 2 miles upon the Delaware River and nearly three-fourths of a mile upon the Schuylkill, and contains within its limits about 800 acres of land.

This property was purchased by the city of Philadelphia and donated to the Government for a navy-yard. Its river frontage carries a depth of water more than sufficient to float the largest battle ships of our Navy. It is less than 4 miles distant from the business center of Philadelphia and is connected therewith by a trolley line; and a very limited extension of existing railroad tracks would place the station in connection with the railroad systems of the United States.

It is in close proximity to the great supply and labor center of Philadelphia; to the coal, iron, and steel industries of the State; to the gun and shell foundries of the vicinity, and to the largest powder factories of the United States. All these needed facilities are nowhere else found so closely grouped around any naval station in the United States, and they place the resources of League Island Navy-Yard beyond question. The station has construction and repair shops, and dry docks have been provided for with capacity to receive any battle ship of our Navy.

In addition to the advantages named, League Island Navy-Yard is the only fresh-water naval station in the United States. The importance of this is the fact that vessels in ordinary could be held in the fresh water of the station for any length or time and could then depart with clean bottoms. Besides this, there would be no corrosion or deterioration of their hulls during indefinite storage in this fresh water. Provision is now being made at the station for the storage of vessels while out of active service by the construction, at the rear of the yard, of a large reserve basin carrying a depth of 30 feet.

A further advantage of League Island Navy-Yard is its impregnability to naval attack. The station is located 30 miles in the rear of the heavy defensive works upon the river at Fort Delaware and vicinity, and therefore meets the fundamental requirement for a navy-yard, viz, "that it should be secure from an attack by land or sea; which should result from the natural advantages of the position, and the vicinity of a dense population, rather than from extensive fortifications and the employment of regular troops at the immediate location."

The value of League Island as a naval station has been strongly emphasized by the duties assigned to it during the recent war with Spain, and by the satisfactory manner in which those duties were discharged.

Under the plan of development which is understood to have been adopted for this naval station, a 30-foot channel of approach, through the Delaware River, is absolutely necessary to permit our battle ships to easily and safely reach the League Island Navy-Yard.

IMPORTANCE OF DEEP-WATER CHANNEL BETWEEN THE SEA AND DELAWARE RIVER SHIPYARDS.

The revival and development of the American merchant marine is one of the most pressing questions of the hour, and none other carries with it issues of greater importance to our future commercial prosperity. The shipyards of the Delaware River at Wilmington, Chester, Camden, and Philadelphia are equipped with the most modern and approved mechanical appliances, and have behind them the additional advantages arising from abundant labor and close proximity to the largest coal, iron, and steel center of the United States. These possibilities only await such encouragement as it is believed our National Government can and will give to make the Delaware River the Clyde of America.

Experience justifies the conclusion that private shipyards can best be relied upon for the rapid, efficient, and economical construction of the ships of our Navy; and that to the Government yards should be delegated the duty of their equipment, maintenance, and possibly repair. To permit private shipyards to undertake the building of vessels required for our Navy, it is desirable that they be located where they can command the best resources, and are surrounded by the most favorable conditions which are possible. Such resources and conditions now surround the shipyards of the Delaware River, with the single exception of an inadequate depth at a few points in the river channel, which would be entirely removed by the formation of the proposed 30-foot channel.

WHAT PHILADELPHIA HAS DONE TOWARD PROVIDING IMPROVED WATER TRANSPORTATION.

If there is merit in energetically helping ourselves before appealing to others for help, it may not be inappropriate to invite attention to the fact that, while urging Congress to further improve the Delaware River as a national highway to the sea, the State of Pennsylvania and city of Philadelphia have shown their faith in the necessity for the improvement by supplementing the appropriations of Congress, during the past eight years, by the very considerable appropriations shown in the following statement:

State appropriation for purchase of islands, 1890	$208,652.82
City appropriation for purchase of islands, 1890	200,000.00
City appropriation for improvement Schuylkill, 1894	40,000.00
City appropriation for improvement Delaware River, 1895	185,000.00
City appropriation for improvement Schuylkill River, 1895	50,000.00
City appropriation for improvement Delaware River, 1896	500,000.00
City appropriation for improvement Schuylkill River, 1896	40,000.00
City appropriation for extending water front, 1896	1,500,000.00
City trusts appropriation for extending water front, 1896	650,000.00
City appropriation for improvement Schuylkill, 1898	90,000.00
Aggregate	3,463,652.82

By the completed improvement of Philadelphia Harbor we have a frontage of about 5 miles upon the Delaware River carrying a low-water depth of over 30 feet and provided with a sufficient number of recently completed wharves and docks, designed to adequately meet the demands of the largest and most modern ocean steamships. Along 1 mile of this frontage the avenue from which these new wharves have been extended has been widened to 150 feet, to provide for all needed facilities for the quick and economical handling of steamship cargoes.

With the harbor improvements, and facilities for transportation already completed and those in progress, Philadelphia Harbor will rank next to the port of New York in the extent and character of the provision which has been made for deep-draft ocean commerce.

With the present inadequate channel depths between the port of Philadelphia and the sea, these harbor improvements can not be utilized to their full value, but must await realization until the completion of the 30-foot channel; and until such a channel is obtained the harbor improvements already made are premature.

PROJECT FOR THE DESIRED IMPROVEMENT.

The river and harbor act of June 3, 1896, provided for a "survey of, and report upon, the Delaware River with a view to obtaining a channel 600 feet wide and 30 feet deep from a point at or near the city of Philadelphia to the deep water of Delaware Bay." In accordance with this provision Col. C. W. Raymond, Corps of Engineers, United States Army, submitted to the War Department, under date of January 5, 1898, his report upon the improvement referred to, which was printed as House Document No. 219, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.

Colonel Raymond estimates that to secure a channel between Philadelphia and deep water in Delaware Bay 600 feet wide and 30 feet deep at low water 32,375,000 cubic yards of earth and 12,100 cubic yards of rock will have to be removed, at an aggregate cost of $5,935,000. Colonel Raymond, in transmitting this report to the Chief of Engineers, United States Army, states "that in his opinion the proposed improvement is worthy of execution and justified by the needs of the commerce involved."

Colonel Raymond further states in his report as follows: "Under the most favorable conditions the execution of the project will require about six years. To conduct the work successfully and economically it should be done under a continuous contract. The above estimate of cost is based upon the assumption that the improvement is to be executed by this method." The method of executing large river and harbor improvements under the continuous-contract system has, in recent years, been adopted upon a number of the prominent improvements of our navigable waterways, and in all cases the results have commended the system for its success and economy.

We believe that the foregoing statement establishes the reasons for increased channel depth in the Delaware River between Philadelphia and the sea. It is required in the interest of cheaper transportation; it is justified by the amount of products tributary to the commerce of the Delaware River; it is required by the greater draft of modern steamships; it is justified as an investment by the National Government; it is required for the development and utilization of League Island Navy-Yard; it is required for the utilization of the shipyards on the Delaware River; and it is justified by the large appropriations recently made by the State of Pennsylvania and city of Philadelphia toward providing improved harbor and increased channel facilities.

In view of these facts, and as representatives of the trade, commercial, and maritime interests of the port of Philadelphia, we most respectfully urge upon Congress the adoption of the project for the formation of a 30-foot channel in the Delaware River between the city of Philadelphia and deep water of Delaware Bay, as set forth in House Document No. 219, Fifty-fifth Congress, through such legislation in the pending river and harbor bill as will provide an initial appropriation for the work; with the further provision "that contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to carry into effect the said project; to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not exceeding in the aggregate $5,935,000."

PHILADELPHIA, December 20, 1898.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I call for a vote on my proposition to change, in line 2, on page 38, the words "three hundred thousand dollars" to "five hundred thousand dollars."

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

Mr. BINGHAM. Mr. Chairman, I think the gentleman in charge of the bill will consent that the word "completing," in line 1, on page 38, may be stricken out and the word "continuing" inserted, for the reason that the amount of $300,000 will not complete the improvement; that is to say, to give a 26-foot channel, as has been proposed and heretofore appropriated for.

Mr. BURTON. The only objection, of course, is a technical one. That is the proper term to apply when the appropriation is made of the whole amount limited or recommended.

I think, however, we can afford, in this case, to vary from the ordinary rule, and therefore I shall not object to the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman moves to substitute the word "continuing" for the word "completing," in line 1 on page 38. If there is no objection the amendment will be considered as adopted.

There was no objection.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Nanticoke River, Delaware and Maryland: Continuing improvement, $3,000.

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, after line 4, page 39, as an additional item, the following:

"Improving inland waterway from Chincoteague Bay, Virginia, to Delaware Bay at or near Lewes, Del.: Continuing improvement, $50,000: Provided, That the money herein appropriated shall be expended between Delaware Bay and Indian River Bay."

Mr. HANDY. Mr. Chairman, this amendment, if adopted, would place a provision on the pending bill for continuing the work which the Government of the United States has been carrying on for the past fourteen years in the construction of an inland waterway between Chincoteague Bay in Virginia and Delaware Bay at or near Lewes, Del.

Gentlemen of course are aware that along the Atlantic coast there is a series of small bays or inlets running along the coast from Rehoboth Bay and Indian River Bay, in Delaware, to Chincoteague Bay, in Virginia, and even extending farther down in Virginia to what is known as the Broad Water. This series of little bays is separated from the ocean by narrow strips of land, forming a series of small islands. According to the proposed Government improvement these bays will be connected by a channel or canal, which will give inland water communication all the way from Philadelphia to a point only a little to the north of Cape Charles.

This work was undertaken, according to a Government survey, in 1884. Every river and harbor bill from that period to this has carried an appropriation for continuing improvement of this inland waterway. The first appropriation, in 1886, was for the sum of $18,750. In 1888 the appropriation was $50,000. In 1890 an appropriation of $50,000 was also made. In 1892, in 1894, and in 1896 the appropriation each year was $25,000.

The Government of the United States has up to the present time appropriated in the various river and harbor bills $193,750 to continue work on this canal, connecting these different bays. Of that $193,000, the sum of $160,600 has been expended, and $26,500 is now on hand, unexpended. The Chief of Engineers recommends a continuation of this work. In his report for 1898 he estimates the amount that can profitably be expended in the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, at $50,000, which is the amount named in the amendment submitted. The amount estimated as required for completion of the existing project is $156,250.

Now, Mr. Chairman, the situation of the Government in regard to this amendment is about as follows: The Government undertook to build a canal. The Government has appropriated $193,000 for the building of that canal. The Government has not yet completed the canal. The whole $193,000 thus far expended is dependent upon the completion of that canal to be of any use in the world. Having appropriated $193,000 in order to dig a canal connecting these bays, shall the Government stop now, when it only requires $156,000 to complete the improvement? Shall this Congress say: "We will waste the $193,000 spent by the six Congresses which have preceded us? It only requires a small sum now to complete the work. It only requires $156,000 to make this canal available, but we will waste all that has been spent, and we will stop now." And why, Mr. Chairman, stop now?

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, to the question asked by the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY] I have no difficulty in returning an answer. He says, "When we have appropriated $193,750 for a project and it requires $156,250 to complete it, shall we stop?" I say yes, most decidedly, if the improvement is not one which commends itself to us on its merits. If there has been waste thus far, let us not hesitate to prevent further waste.

There is an additional reason in this case. There is the sum of $25,500 on hand. The Government became engaged in a controversy about the right of way and all proceedings are tied up. The provision in the act of 1896 was that no part of this appropriation should be expended until the right of way is secured without cost to the United States, etc. That right of way has not been secured.

Mr. HANDY. I move to strike out the last word. The statement which the gentleman from Ohio has made with regard to the trouble about the right of way furnishes, I think, a complete demonstration that he is mistaken in regard to the utility of this inland waterway. That complication about the right of way arises from the fact that a railroad company secured an injunction against the Government of the United States to prevent the digging of this canal.

Now, I take it that the common sense of this House will realize at once that when a railroad company thinks a proposed river and harbor improvement is of sufficient advantage to the people to make it worth the railroad's while to interfere by an injunction, the improvement in question must be one of real merit. If this canal were not to be of use to the commerce of the people, the Pennsylvania Railroad Company, which taps that section of the country, would never have gone to the expense of stopping it by injunction. The canal threatens to compete with the railroad. It is just exactly because this canal is of use, it is just exactly because this money we have spent will be of avail to the commerce of that section of the country that this interference has occurred. Instead of this interference being a reason why the Government of the United States should abandon its expenditure of $193,000, it furnishes abundant reason why the Government of the United States should persevere. There need be no difficulty in wiping away that injunction. According to the Engineer's report, proceedings have been properly begun to get the right of way. The difficulty may easily be removed long before the time comes to spend this money.

What is the situation, Mr. Chairman? The Government of the United States starts a canal. It expends $193,000 on that canal. A railroad company puts an injunction in the way, and this House, stopping in front of a railroad's injunction, says: "We will quit; we will give up the $193,000 we have spent; we will stop in the face of an injunction, and lie down and appropriate no more money. We will abandon this hole in the ground; we will quit this ditch; we will give up this canal, forsooth, because a railroad company puts an injunction in front of the United States Government."

Why, Mr. Chairman, there is every reason in the world for going on with this matter. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] says that we have here $26,000 unexpended. That will be wasted, too, if we stop here. If this item drops out of the present bill, I fear the canal will be an abandoned project. It may not appear, perchance, two years hence in the Engineer's report. I ask, Mr. Chairman, for mere continuity of purpose, if for no other reason, an appropriation to carry on a work seriously begun and seriously followed for fourteen years. The Congress of the United States can not afford to change its mind about projects half completed. In this case the Government long since "put its hand to the plow." Let it not now falter or look back. [Cries of "Vote!"]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, all I have to say is that it is not the fault of the Government that the railroad is in the way. I trust gentlemen will not be deceived. The arm of the law is sufficient to condemn that right of way; but, as I take it from the documents, it appears that those interested in the waterway promised to secure the right of way and pay for it. They have not secured it.

Mr. HANDY. It is not a question of dollars and cents.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Lower Machodoc Creek, Virginia: Continuing improvement, $1,500.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 6, page 41:
"Improving Nandua Creek, Virginia: Completing improvement in accordance with the approved project, $3,000."

Mr. JONES of Virginia. Mr. Chairman, I think that the gentleman in charge of this bill will not object to this amendment. The act of June 3, 1896, appropriated $3,000 for the improvement of Nandua Creek. The Chief of Engineers estimated that it would require $6,000 to complete this project. Of that $6,000, as I have said, $3,000 was appropriated under the act of 1896. But the Chief of Engineers did not deem it proper to expend that amount, because, as he has said in a letter to me, which I shall be glad to read to the committee, the amount was too small to accomplish the work projected and desired. The letter is as follows.

OFFICE OF THE CHIEF OF ENGINEERS, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Washington, D. C., January 25, 1899.

MY DEAR SIR: Referring to our conversation of to-day, I have to say that the appropriation of June 3, 1896, for Nandua Creek was not expended, because it was too small to accomplish the work projected and desired.

Three thousand dollars in addition will be required. When this appropriation is available the work will be promptly commenced.

Yours, very respectfully,

JOHN M. WILSON,
Brigadier-General, Chief of Engineers, U. S. A.

Hon. WILLIAM A. JONES,
House of Representatives.

Now, Mr. Chairman, it appears that the whole amount necessary to do this work is $6,000, of which $3,000 has already been appropriated but as yet is unexpended for the reason stated in the letter just read by me. I am quite sure that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors would have favored this appropriation had their attention been called to the fact that the project had been approved and that the Government had actually entered upon the improvement, which was merely postponed in order to secure sufficient money to enable the work to be done economically.

The $3,000 which I now ask will complete the work, a work which is an exceedingly important and meritorious one, and I trust that the gentleman in charge of the bill will not object to the small appropriation contained in this amendment, and which is simply intended to carry out a project recommended by the Engineering Department, and for which $3,000 had already been appropriated, although unexpended.

That the project is a meritorious one is shown by the fact that Congress has approved it and appropriated for it. Nothing has transpired since this project was approved to cause Congress to withhold the money estimated to complete it. The amount is too small to be objected to, and I trust this House will not hesitate to appropriate it.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I can not consent to this amendment, partly as a matter of precedent and partly on its merits. I want to say to the gentleman that this was not called for.

Mr. JONES of Virginia. It was not specifically asked for. That may have been an oversight on my part, but I naturally concluded that the committee intended to follow the recommendations of the Chief of Engineers, and that the appropriation asked for would have been made. My attention was not called to this palpable oversight until the bill was reported.

Mr. BURTON. It appears by the reports for 1897 that the commerce of this creek was 3,436 tons. It is stated to be a decrease of 2,689 tons when compared with the amount of the report for 1896. It appears also that there is a depth of 5 feet at mean low water over the bar; also that there is on hand $2,988.08, or was at the close of the last fiscal year.

In the proportion in which we have been making provision for creeks and rivers of this kind certainly that is as much as this creek or river, whatever you may call it, should ask. There are others having ten times as much commerce for which we have made little or no appropriation whatever.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Fishing Creek, North Carolina: For maintenance, $2,000.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

At the end of line 14, on page 42, add:
"And $7,750 for continuing improvements."

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Mr. Chairman, I had hoped that I would have the cooperation of the chairman of this committee, or at least his consent to the insertion of this amendment. This creek, Fishing Creek, North Carolina, through its confluence with the river, is 94 miles above Pamlico Sound, and at that part crossed by the Wilmington and Weldon Railroad Fishing Creek is 35 feet deep and 150 feet wide. The channel depth on its bar is only 3 feet. There has been an appropriation made, and there has been considerable work done on this creek, which is fully detailed in the report of the engineers of the War Department. To make available and to make profitable the money which has already been expended the amount I have suggested is exactly the figures recommended by the Corps of Engineers as an absolute necessity.

They say that $10,000 can properly be expended during the next fiscal year. I am asking only the minimum amount recommended by the engineers. I approached the committee and asked it that this amount be inserted. The only answer I got was that my request came too late. I trust that even now the committee will reverse itself and allow this small request to go in. I have invariably voted with you gentlemen and helped you to get millions upon top of millions. This is the first time I have asked you for one cent, and I trust you will not take it lightly and laughingly vote it down. It is a necessity for the farmers along that river, which ramifies my district from one end to the other, and it would be a great benefit if this amount were allowed, and would make profitable the amount of money which has already been appropriated and expended.

Mr. FISCHER. How much do you want?

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Only $7,750, and I am afraid you are going to vote it down.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I do not wish to antagonize the committee, and I hope the committee will not antagonize my little request. I ask it on the ground of justice—yes, on the ground of necessity. [Applause.]

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman from North Carolina a question. I see this is Fish Creek.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Fishing Creek.

Mr. SIMPSON. I want to inquire if the water on the bar is of sufficient depth for the fish to get up over the bar without lightering? [Laughter.]

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. Yes; and when the gentleman gets through with his cattle on the prairie, if he will come down there, I will show him that it is. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, the Committee on Rivers and Harbors are not recognizing any politics or any other distinctions in this bill. It does not seem to me that the project merits a larger appropriation.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. You have not given me anything yet.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; we have.

Mr. WHITE of North Carolina. It is only for maintenance and not one dollar for continuing the work.

Mr. BURTON. Well, there are a great many members here that are thankful to get an appropriation for maintenance. A good many have not anything even for maintenance. The commerce of this river for the last year was 2,460 tons. It is classified as 2,400 tons of timber—I do not know whether it floated down in logs or was sawed lumber—and 60 tons of fertilizer.

One hopeful thing about it is that it shows an increase of 460 tons over the year before. There were no transportation lines established last year. It appears by the Engineer's report that $1,500 will be required for the maintenance of the improvement during the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900. It appears that there was on hand July 1, 1898, an available balance of $2,566.

I will say to the gentleman from North Carolina that he can justify himself to his constituents by saying that this stream has been very much better considered than the average one in this bill.

The question was taken; and the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, the hour of 5 o'clock having arrived, and we having got to the end of page 50 of the bill, I move that the committee now rise.

The motion was agreed to.

Accordingly the committee rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS, Chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill (H. R. 11795) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public works on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes, and had come to no resolution thereon.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had passed the following resolution; in which the concurrence of the House was requested:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 8,000 copies of the chronological list of battles in which troops of the permanent establishment have participated from the organization of the Army in 1789, together with statistics of losses and the names of officers wounded or killed in action; 1,000 copies for the Senate, 2,000 copies for the House, and 5,000 copies for the War Department.

WITHDRAWAL OF PAPERS.

Mr. PUGH requested unanimous consent to withdraw papers accompanying the bill (H. R. 1435) to grant an increase of pension to W. J. Worthington, no adverse report having been made thereon.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion was agreed to; and accordingly (at 5 o'clock and 5 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock meridian.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. SPOONER. I ask that the joint resolution introduced by the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST] be laid before the Senate.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Chair lays Senate joint resolution No. 191 before the Senate, which the Secretary will read.

The Secretary read the joint resolution (S. R. 191) declaring that under the Constitution of the United States no power is given to the Federal Government to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently as colonies, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That under the Constitution of the United States no power is given to the Federal Government to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently as colonies.

The colonial system of European nations can not be established under our present Constitution, but all territory acquired by the Government, except such small amount as may be necessary for coaling stations, correction of boundaries, and similar governmental purposes, must be acquired and governed with the purpose of ultimately organizing such territory into States suitable for admission into the Union.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, however it may seem to my brother Senators, I have always a reluctance to take the time of the Senate, which it is difficult to overcome, and I would not ask indulgence this morning if it were not for the fact that the questions presented by this and kindred resolutions are of grave importance and interest, and also for the fact that the position which duty, as I view it, constrains me to take upon this treaty (which has been made public) might seem, without explanation of my views upon it, to be inconsistent with the attitude which I felt obliged to take upon the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands. I have not in the slightest degree changed my mind as to that measure, either in relation to the general policy underlying it or as to the manner in which it was accomplished.

Constitutional objections are presented here, beginning with that suggested by the resolution now before the Senate, which are of course important. The debate upon them has been a notable one. The Senators from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT], from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], and from Minnesota [Mr. NELSON] have very ably presented the views upon that subject which generally I entertain. I find no objection to this treaty upon constitutional grounds. I shall take little time, however, in debate upon these questions.

If I thought the resolution called the "Vest resolution" to be based upon a sound construction of the Constitution, and that the United States has no power to acquire territory except with a view to "statehood," I could not vote to accept any cession for any purpose, for any time, of the Philippine Archipelago, for I am frank to say I can conceive of no circumstances under which I could ever give my consent to the admission of the Philippine Archipelago as a State or as States into the Union.

This Philippine proposition is one of the fruits of the war. To me it is one of the bitter fruits of the war. I wish with all my heart we were honorably quit of it. The doctrine of the "Vest resolution" is based upon the opinion of Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case (19 Howard, 393).

If the opinion of Judge Taney were right in its major premise his conclusion would almost inevitably follow. In that case Chief Justice Taney said:

There is certainly no power given by the Constitution to the Federal Government to establish or maintain colonies bordering on the United States or at a distance, to be ruled and governed at its own pleasure, nor to enlarge its territorial limits in any way except by the admission of new States. That power is plainly given; and if a new State is admitted it needs no further legislation by Congress, because the Constitution itself defines the relative rights and powers and duties of the State and the citizens of the State and the Federal Government. But no power is given to acquire a territory to be held and governed permanently in that character.

That is, in the character of a Territory.

Now, if the only power under which the United States could acquire territory is the power to admit new States, which is vested in Congress, it would seem inevitably to follow that territory acquired in the exercise of that implied power must be acquired "with a view to statehood." It is difficult for me to see how, under the power given to Congress to admit new States, Congress could acquire territory. Congress can not negotiate for the acquisition of territory. It never has attempted to do it so far as I know until perhaps the annexation of the Hawaiian Islands.

Mr. HOAR. And in the case of Texas?

Mr. SPOONER. Texas, Congress admitted as a State. It never acquired it as a Territory. Congress has never before attempted to acquire territory. By the treaty-making power territory may be acquired. It is not acquired, however, by Congress. It is acquired by the President, with the requisite ratification of the Senate. The Congress may appropriate money required to effectuate such a treaty or it may refuse, but nothing Congress can do can add the territory to the United States.

The Congress may declare war. The President carries it on. Congress declares war, but Congress can not make peace. It can not dictate the terms of peace. That is for the President and the Senate. So I have not thought of a situation in which Congress, in the exercise of the implied power drawn by Chief Justice Taney from this power to admit "new States," can acquire territory.

Mr. BACON. We acquired Hawaii in that way.

Mr. SPOONER. I have referred to that. I regarded that as without the constitutional authority of Congress, and I never have heard, nor do I expect to hear, a satisfactory answer to the argument submitted by the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] upon the constitutionality of that proposition.

The contention of Chief Justice Taney, that the United States can acquire territory only with a view to statehood, is necessarily based upon the assumption that it can acquire territory only from the power implied in the words, "New States may be admitted by the Congress into the Union." If this assumption be not true, the foundation of Chief Justice Taney's conclusion falls. It is really altogether too late in the history of this Government to consider debatable the question whether power exists in the United States, outside of that clause of the Constitution upon which Chief Justice Taney's opinion was based, to acquire territory. It has been settled otherwise by the action of the Government from the beginning, in the acquisition of territory, and by repeated decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States.

Territory may be acquired under the treaty-making power. If anything is settled, that is settled. It began with the acquisition of Louisiana, and ended with the acquisition of Alaska.

The power to make treaties is, under the Constitution, absolutely without limit, except, of course, certain inherent limitations. Certainly a treaty may not be made which would violate the Constitution, attempt to dismember a State, or to destroy our form of government.

Judge Duer, in his work upon the Constitution, well states the limitations thus:

More general and extensive terms also are used in vesting the power with respect to treaties than in conferring that relative to laws.

This is accurate and significant. He continues:

The power must, indeed, be construed in subordination to the Constitution; and however, in its operation, it may qualify, it can not supersede or interfere with any other of its fundamental provisions, nor can it ever be so interpreted as to destroy other powers granted by that instrument. A treaty to change the organization of the Government, or annihilate its sovereignty, or overturn its republican form, or to deprive it of any of its constitutional powers, would be void; because it would defeat the will of the people, which it was designed to fulfill. (Duer's Constitutional Jurisprudence, page 228.)

It was said by the Supreme Court in De Geofroy vs. Riggs (133 U. S., 258), as to the treaty-making power and its limitations, as follows:

The treaty power, as expressed in the Constitution, is in terms unlimited except by those restraints which are found in that instrument against the action of the Government or of its departments, and those arising from the nature of the Government itself and of that of the States. It would not be contended that it extends so far as to authorize what the Constitution forbids, or a change in the character of the Government or in that of one of the States, or a cession of any portion of the territory of the latter without its consent. (Fort Leavenworth R. Co. vs. Lowe, 114 U. S., 525, 541.) But, with these exceptions, it is not perceived that there is any limit to the questions which can be adjusted touching any matter which is properly the subject of negotiation with a foreign country. (Ware vs. Hylton, 3 U. S., 3 Dall., 199; Chirac vs. Chirac, 15 U. S., 2 Wheat., 259; Huenstein vs. Lynhan, 100 U. S., 483; Droit d'Aubaine, 8 Ops. Atty. Gen., 417.)

Nor is the treaty-making power the only power by which under the Constitution the United States can acquire territory. It necessarily follows from the war power. To Congress is given the power to declare war. This involves the power, of course, to make or carry on war. The power in a government to declare and make or carry on war involves, ex necessitate rei, the power to make peace and to dictate, if a victor, the terms of peace. There is no purpose to be found in the Constitution to limit the power of the National Government, war having been declared and carried on, as to the terms of peace. This Government has the power, therefore, at the end of a war, to exact anything as a part of the terms of settlement which any other government has the power to exact.

No one would contend, I apprehend, that war being declared and carried on, this Government has not the power to demand, as a condition of peace, indemnity to its citizens for violated treaties, to itself for reimbursement of war expenses, and even more than that. No one, I think, will say that when the United States declares and engages in war, offensive or defensive, it may not justly claim the right and power, if successful, which the rules of war and international law give to other nations succeeding in war. If this is true, the Government of the United States has, under the war power, the right to acquire territory, either by conquest or, what is substantially the same thing, exacted indemnity.

If the government with which the war is waged be bankrupt, and therefore has ability only to respond by cession of territory, it is difficult to conceive of any reason why the United States, the victor in a war, may not demand, by right of conquest or as indemnity, the cession of territory. If, indeed, the nation vanquished be the most opulent of nations and able to respond by way of money indemnity, no reason can easily be perceived why, if territory is to the conquering government, by reason of its strategic situation or otherwise, of greater value from the national standpoint than money, it may not demand territory. In other words, I can find nothing in the Constitution warranting the contention that the United States, involved in successful war, is not as unfettered in its conditions of peace as any government upon the earth would be.

The right to acquire territory either under the treaty-making power or under the war-making power not only clearly exists, from the language of the Constitution itself, but has been many times declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, as it has been exercised by the Government in its history.

Chief Justice Marshall, who was a contemporary of the men who framed the Constitution, and who will always be recognized, I think, as its greatest and most accurate expounder, said, in American Insurance Company vs. Canter (1 Peters, 511):

The Constitution confers absolutely on the Government of the Union the powers of making war and of making treaties; consequently that Government possesses the power of acquiring territory, either by conquest or by treaty.

In Fleming vs. Page (9 Howard, 614) the Supreme Court, through Mr. Chief Justice Taney, said:

The United States, it is true, may extend its boundaries by conquest or treaty and may demand the cession of territory as a condition of peace, in order to indemnify its citizens for the injuries they have suffered or to reimburse the Government for the expenses of the war; but this can be done only by the treaty-making power or legislative authority, and is not a part of the power conferred upon the President by the declaration of war.

I confess I do not quite understand what is meant by the words "legislative authority."

The power also to acquire territory by conquest is clearly affirmed in Cross vs. Harrison (16 How., 189). It has also been affirmed repeatedly by the Supreme Court in other cases, to which I shall briefly refer upon another branch of my argument.

I repeat that it can not be successfully denied that the United States may by the treaty-making power acquire territory. The acquisition under the treaty-making power, independent of its function in settling a war, would be either a purchase, an interchange, or a settlement of some boundary controversy.

Again, I think that the position, with very great ability elaborated by the Senator from Connecticut, is well sustained that if the Constitution were silent as to the treaty-making power and the power to declare war, the United States would, nevertheless, be empowered under the Constitution to acquire territory, as an inherent element of sovereignty.

That by the Constitution the States created a nation can not well be disputed. It has been admitted by other governments from its foundation, has been many times declared by the Supreme Court of the United States, and determined by an irreversible decree of the God of battles.

Under the Confederation the States possessed the power to wage war, to deal with other governments, and to acquire and dispose of territory. All of this power by the Constitution they surrendered to the Federal Government, and by that instrument they vested all sovereignty in that Government for national purposes which they did not reserve to the States or to the people. The powers referred to are reserved to neither. Therefore, they were vested in the Government of the United States.

It inheres in sovereignty to contract with other nations, to wage war, either of conquest or defense, to acquire territory, and to dispose of it. I think if the power to declare war was not expressly given in the Constitution to Congress it would, nevertheless, have existed, and would have been vested in the President as one of the executive functions given by the Constitution to him. I say this because, as I remember, at the adoption of the Constitution the power to declare war was in all governments an executive function, subject, of course, in many to the parliament or law-making power to regulate that power by its control of the purse. This is quite well recognized by the Supreme Court of the United States, but I can not take the time to cite the cases in this connection.

Hall, in his work on International Law, section 9, pages 47–50, says:

The rights of a state with respect to property consist in the power to acquire territory, * * * in being entitled to peaceable possession and enjoyment of that which it has duly obtained, and in the faculty of using its property as it chooses and alienating it at will.

Pomeroy, in his lectures on International Law, edited by Woolsey, page 198, says:

A state being regarded in our law as a body politic or distinct moral being, naturally sovereign and independent, it is considered capable of the same rights, duties, and obligations, with respect to other individuals. Among the most important of these natural rights, is that of acquiring, possessing, and enjoying property. * * * A sovereign has the same absolute right to dispose of its territorial, or rather public, property as it has to acquire such property.

It was the obvious intention of the framers of the Constitution, and of the States which ratified it, to create by that instrument a national sovereignty which should have all powers not reserved to the States or the people, or limited by the instrument itself. The authorities cited by the distinguished Senator from Connecticut upon this point are entirely adequate.

I am not at liberty, with the pressure upon me as to time and otherwise, to stop to comment upon them, or to cite others. I utterly deny that it was the purpose of the framers of the Constitution to confer upon the National Government the power to make treaties with other limitations than those to which I have referred, or to declare war, and to deny the power possessed by other sovereignties in closing war.

And so, in my view, it is established that the assumption of Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case, that the power of the Government to acquire territory is exclusively implied from the power given to Congress to admit new States into the Union, is without warrant in the Constitution, and that with the successful impeachment of his premises his conclusion falls, and that, therefore, the resolution of the Senator from Missouri, predicated mainly upon the opinion of Chief Justice Taney in the Dred Scott case, is without foundation.

That was a great political case, Mr. President. I was taught from the time it was made to look with aversion upon it. In maturer years I am not so certain that all of the criticisms made upon it were justified, but, upon the whole, so far at least as the opinion relates to the subject under debate, it may fairly be said that the argument of the great Chief Justice was such an one as an able, learned, subtle, and ingenious lawyer would have made who held a brief for African slavery. It is impossible to obscure the fact that running through the entire opinion, concealed in many places, was the motive, and I say this without imputation upon his patriotism or integrity, to safeguard the interests of African slavery, to overturn the Missouri compromise, and to establish the right of the slaveholder to carry his human property into the Territories as freely as he could carry any other property, protected by the Constitution, and beyond obstruction by Congress or Territorial enactment.

But the opinion ceased long ago to be regarded as the law of the land or a correct interpretation of the Constitution in the respect of which I am speaking. I have marveled, in view of the accuracy of his reasoning, and the wealth of learning displayed by him in other opinions, that he was willing in this great case to limit the Government in the acquisition of territory to a mere implication from the power to admit new States.

Conceding, Mr. President, the power, by treaty of purchase or as a condition of peace, or in the exercise of an inherent sovereignty surrendered by the States to the Government of the United States, to acquire territory, I have not been able to find (some Senators may be able to do so) any limitation in the Constitution as to its locality, any warrant for the contention that it must be contiguous to the continent upon which we live. It may be, or it may not be, good policy to acquire distant territory "over seas," but, so far as the matter of power is concerned, I have not been able to find any restriction geographical in its character.

I have done, Mr. President, with all discussion as to the power of the Government of the United States to acquire territory. I pause for a moment to discuss its power to govern territory. It would seem not needful that there should be judicial determination to establish the existence of this power. In the very nature of things, the power to acquire territory and to hold it involves the power to govern it. To say that the United States may acquire territory, but may not govern it, would be an obvious absurdity. But the Constitution is not silent upon this subject. It says:

The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

That the power to acquirp by treaty or by war necessarily implies the power to govern was asserted by Chief Justice Marshall in Sere and Laralde vs. Pitot and others (6 Cranch., 337). He says:

The power of governing and of legislating for a Territory is the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire and to hold territory. Could this position be contested, the Constitution of the United States declares that "Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States." Accordingly, we find Congress possessing and exercising the absolute and undisputed power of governing and legislating for the Territory of Orleans. Congress has given them a legislative, an executive, and a judiciary, with such powers as it has been their will to assign to those departments respectively.

The suggestion that we can acquire territory which we can not govern would be rejected by anyone. Chancellor Kent says (1 Commentaries, page 385):

It would seem, from these various Congressional regulations of the Territories belonging to the United States, that Congress have supreme power in the government of them, depending on the exercise of their sound discretion. That discretion has hitherto been exercised in wisdom and good faith, and with anxious regard for the security of the rights and privileges of the inhabitants, as defined and declared in the ordinance of July, 1787, and in the Constitution of the United States. "All admit," said Chief Justice Marshall (4 Wheaton, 422), "the constitutionality of a Territorial government."

The Supreme Court of the United States has said, Mr. Justice Bradley speaking for the court, in the case of the Late Corporation of Latter-Day Saints vs. United States (136 U. S., 1):

The power of Congress over the Territories of the United States is general and plenary, arising from and incidental to the right to acquire the territory itself, and from the power given by the Constitution to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States. It would be absurd to hold that the United States has power to acquire territory and no power to govern it when acquired. The power to acquire territory other than the territory northwest of the Ohio River (which belonged to the United States at the adoption of the Constitution) is derived from the treaty-making power and the power to declare and carry on war. The incidents of these powers are those of national sovereignty and belong to all independent governments. The power to make acquisitions of territory by conquest, by treaty, and by cession is an incident of national sovereignty.

The Territory of Louisiana, when acquired from France, and the Territories west of the Rocky Mountains, when acquired from Mexico, became the absolute property and domain of the United States, subject to such conditions as the Government, in its diplomatic negotiations, had seen fit to accept relating to the rights of the people then inhabiting those Territories. Having rightfully acquired said Territories, the United States Government was the only one which could impose laws upon them, and its sovereignty over them was complete. No State of the Union had any such right of sovereignty over them; no other country or government had any such right. These propositions are so elementary and so necessarily follow from the condition of things arising upon the acquisition of new territory that they need no argument to support them. They are self-evident.

Chief Justice Marshall, in the case of the American and Ohio Insurance Companies vs. 356 Bales of Cotton (26 U. S., 1 Pet., 511, 542), well said: "Perhaps the power of governing a Territory belonging to the United States, which has not, by becoming a State, acquired the means of self-government, may result necessarily from the facts that it is not within the jurisdiction of any particular State, and is within the power and jurisdiction of the United States. The right to govern may be the inevitable consequence of the right to acquire territory. Whichever may be the source whence the power is derived, the possession of it is unquestioned."

And Mr. Justice Nelson, delivering the opinion of the court in Benner vs. Porter (50 U. S., 9 How., 235, 242), speaking of the Territorial governments established by Congress, says: "They are legislative governments, and their courts legislative courts, Congress, in the exercise of its powers in the organization and government of the Territories, combining the powers of both the Federal and State authorities."

Chief Justice Waite, in the case of First National Bank vs. Yankton County (101 U. S., 129, 133), said: "In the organic act of Dakota there was not an express reservation of power in Congress to amend the acts of the Territorial legislature, nor was it necessary. Such a power is an incident of sovereignty, and continues until granted away. Congress may not only abrogate laws of the Territorial legislatures, but it may itself legislate directly for the local government. It may make a void act of the Territorial legislature valid, and a valid act void. In other words, it has full and complete legislative authority over the people of the Territories and all the departments of the Territorial governments. It may do for the Territories what the people, under the Constitution of the United States, may do for the States."

In a still more recent case, and one relating to the legislation of Congress over the Territory of Utah itself, Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S., 15, 44), Mr. Justice Matthews said: "The counsel for the appellants in argument seemed to question the constitutional power of Congress to pass the act of March 22, 1882, so far as it abridges the rights of electors in the Territory under previous laws. But that question is, we think, no longer open to discussion. It has passed beyond the stage of controversy into final judgment. The people of the United States, as sovereign owners of the national Territories, have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution or are necessarily implied in its terms."

The Supreme Court say, in Murphy vs. Ramsey (114 U. S.):

The people of the United States, as sovereign owners of the national Territories, have supreme power over them and their inhabitants. In the exercise of this sovereign dominion they are represented by the Government of the United States, to whom all the powers of government over that subject have been delegated, subject only to such restrictions as are expressed in the Constitution, or are necessarily implied in its terms, or in the purposes and objects of the power itself; for it may well be admitted in respect to this, as to every power of society over its members, that it is not absolute and unlimited. But in ordaining government for the Territories and the people who inhabit them, all the discretion which belongs to legislative power is vested in Congress; and that extends, beyond all controversy, to determining by law from time to time the form of the local government in a particular Territory and the qualifications of those who shall administer it.

It rests with Congress to say whether, in a given case, any of the people resident in the Territory shall participate in the election of its officers or the making of its laws; and it may, therefore, take from them any right of suffrage it may previously have conferred, or at any time modify or abridge it, as it may deem expedient. The right of local self-government, as known to our system as a constitutional franchise, belongs, under the Constitution, to the States and to the people thereof, by whom that Constitution was ordained, and to whom by its terms all power not conferred by it upon the Government of the United States was expressly reserved. The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them, as to other citizens, by the principles of constitutional liberty which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national; their political rights are franchises which they hold as privileges in the legislative discretion of the Congress of the United States.

I do not take the time to cite other cases.

Chief Justice Taney sought to emasculate the constitutional provision which gives to Congress the power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States by holding—

That the power given by this language, whatever it may be, is confined, and was intended to be confined, to the territory which at that time belonged to or was claimed by the United States and was within their boundaries as settled by the treaty with Great Britain, and can have no influence upon a Territory afterwards acquired from a foreign government.

This remarkable proposition he supported by ingenious reasoning. It is repudiated by the Supreme Court in many cases and in the constant practice of Congress in the government of the Territories. I think it may safely be said it never has received the approval of the profession. It is difficult to understand how such a construction should ever have received the sanction of so great a name.

The framers of the Constitution were not making the Constitution to operate for a limited time. They were wise men; they were building a government which they hoped would last forever; they were careful in framing the instrument to use general language. As has been said by a great Chief Justice, it is not an instrument of definitions. The framers knew, as I have had occasion once before to remark to the Senate, the danger of detail, and they used language elastic in its nature and clearly expressing the power conferred in general terms and leaving full play for necessary implied powers; and it is the glory of their work that the instrument which they made for the government of a few States is as well adapted to-day for the government of forty-five States, and would be for a government of a hundred States.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator does not object, I desire to occupy just a moment of his time, in order that there may be a correction of what I think is a mistaken statement on his part.

Mr. SPOONER. I yield to the Senator.

Mr. BACON. The Senator says that the doctrine as to the unconstitutionality of annexing territory originated with Judge Taney in the celebrated Dred Scott case, and that it was promulgated for the purpose indicated by him, for the maintenance of African slavery. I desire, Mr. President, without unduly occupying his time, to call the attention of the Senator to the fact that precisely the same contention was made on the floor of Congress in the year 1811 by Mr. Quincy, of Massachusetts, the grandfather, I believe, of the present mayor of Boston, in which he took the position, not, certainly, in the interest of the maintenance of African slavery, that the acquisition of foreign territory by the United States Government was not only unconstitutional, but that such acquisition would be a sufficient reason why New England should withdraw from the Federal Union. That was in the year of 1811, forty years and more before the pronouncement of the Dred Scott decision.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, Mr. President, I did not have in mind propositions that had been made on the floor of Congress. I was speaking of judicial decisions.

Mr. BACON. These are generally political questions.

Mr. SPOONER. I know of no judicial declaration of this kind except in the Dred Scott decision.

Mr. BACON. It had never been before the court.

Mr. SPOONER. Judicial decisions are what I had in my mind.

Now, what conceivable reason could there be for limiting the power of the Government, under this language, to territory then acquired and excluding from its operation territory thereafter to be acquired?

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

The language is general. It was prospective in its operation. There was no possible reason for restricting it. It never could have entered the minds of the framers of the Constitution that no territory would ever be acquired except that which had been acquired at the time of the adoption of this instrument, and there would be as much reason in limiting the power to dispose of "other property" and to make needful rules and regulations for the disposal of "other property" as of territory. It is impossible to restrict this power of Congress as to the territory and not say at the same time that it was intended to be restricted as to "property," the word which follows "territory;" and can any man imagine a reason why the framers of the Constitution should have desired to restrict the power of Congress "to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property" to property then owned by the United States?

I mention that, Mr. President, to show once more how utterly unreasonable and without foundation is this decision, so far as it respects the question I am discussing; how impossible it is in the very nature of things that it could be a permanent construction of our Constitution, and as further warrant also for the opinion that it had its origin in the purpose which I have mentioned.

I do not wish to take much time to discuss the question further as to how we may govern territory. I do not care to debate the question whether ex proprio vigore the Constitution is over the Territories. I have no doubt myself—and I think the authorities clearly sustain it—that the Constitution, so far as it relates to government, was intended for the States. It was made by the States.

The Supreme Court says, in Murphy vs. Ramsey, supra:

> The right of local self-government, as known to our system as a constitutional franchise, belongs, under the Constitution, to the States and to the people thereof, by whom that Constitution was ordained, and to whom by its terms all power not conferred by it upon the Government of the United States was expressly reserved.

The Territories are not and never have been consulted, nor can they be in the government of the States; they have no voice in the election of President; they can not be represented in the Halls of Congress; they can not elect or appoint Senators of the United States—only the States can do that; they have no voice in amending the Constitution of the United States—the States alone can do that.

The Territorial courts are not courts of the United States. They are courts created by Congress. The judges in the Territories, although appointed by the President and confirmed by the Senate, are not judges of the United States. They derive their jurisdiction from the legislation of Congress. As is said by Chief Justice Marshall, in Insurance Company vs. Canter:

> These courts, then, are not constitutional courts, in which the judicial power conferred by the Constitution on the General Government can be deposited. They are incapable of receiving it. They are legislative courts, created in virtue of the general right of sovereignty which exists with the Government or in virtue of that clause which enables Congress to make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory belonging to the United States. The jurisdiction with which they are invested is not a part of that judicial power which is defined in the third article of the Constitution, but is conferred by Congress in the execution of those general powers which that body possesses over the Territories of the United States.

The United States as a sovereignty derives its power from the States, and consists of the States. The Territories are not a part of the United States. They are not members of the Federal Union.

The Government created and maintained for and by the States and the people of the States governs the Territories under the power given in the Constitution to Congress to govern the Territories; and, Mr. President, in my judgment—and I think the contention is entirely in harmony with the Constitution and with the decisions—Congress may govern the Territories as it chooses so far as civil government is concerned. I do not now speak of the limitations upon Congressional power growing out of the bill of rights. I do not contend here that Congress, legislating for the Territories, can deprive persons therein of the right of trial by jury, of the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus, of religious liberty, or that Congress could pass a law taking the property of A and giving it to B in a Territory.

> The personal and civil rights of the inhabitants of the Territories are secured to them, as to other citizens, by the principles of constitutional liberty which restrain all the agencies of government, State and national. Their political rights are franchises which they hold as privileges in the legislative discretion of the Congress of the United States. (Murphy v. Ramsey, supra.)

The power of Congress seems to be quite supreme as to the government which it shall provide for a Territory. I am speaking of civil government, not personal rights.

The guaranty in the Constitution of republican government is to the "State," not to any Territory. Congress may govern Territories through a governor. It has often provided for laws to be enforced in the Territories made by a governor and a council. It may give to the people of the Territories self-government or it may withhold it. It may give them the privilege to vote or it may withhold it, or, having given it, it may modify that privilege or it may take it away, as the Supreme Court decided in the Mormon Church case. It may abrogate any law enacted in the Territory.

This power of Congress over the Territories, as broadly as I claim it, has not only been declared by the Supreme Court more than once, but, as was shown by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], has been exercised by Congress from the beginning. The legislation as to the Territories has been varied. It has been so enacted as to adapt itself to the needs of the different communities. That is the language and the spirit of the Constitution. It was intended that great latitude should be left to Congress. It was not supposed that the same laws and the same system of government would be adapted to every people in every Territory which in the course of time might be acquired by the United States. So Congress is given the power "to make all needful rules and regulations."

That word "needful" in this connection is a large word. It was meant to be a large word. There was a wise purpose in using it, and that was to give to Congress the power to adapt its legislation as to government and otherwise within the limitations I suggested to the wants of different communities. What might suit the situation in the Territory of Orleans might not suit the situation in some other Territory acquired by the United States.

There is another thing here, Mr. President, in this language which sustains the view that the Constitution in the governmental sense was not made for the Territories, but was made really for the Government of the United States. The Territories are considered property of the United States. They are referred to in the Constitution as "belonging" to the United States. The power is given here to dispose of territory. There can be no greater evidence or exercise of dominion than that. What restriction is there upon the power of Congress, when we have acquired territory, to govern it and to govern its people by such form of government as it deems needful, bearing in mind always—that I will not contend against—that when we have organized a Territory, and are making laws for the Territory, those personal rights guaranteed by the Constitution are to be observed?

Senators do not like the word "colony." I do not like it. It is certainly not accurate as applied to the Philippines. It has been well said, "The meaning of it is too well fixed to admit of ambiguous sense even in a popular harangue, much less in a judicial decision. It always means a body of cultivators transplanted by the Government to a distant possession and governed and protected there by the mother country, of which it is to be always the dependent, never the equal. * * * Distance, governmental transplantation, perpetual inferiority is their inexorable characteristic." I should think better of the Philippines if they were within this definition a "colony." The word "territory" is the word for us to use, however, because it is the word adopted by the framers of the Constitution. But I know of no reason why, under the Constitution, a Territory and its people may not be forever governed by Congress, if that shall be determined to be the true policy of the country, absolutely safeguarding every one of those great personal rights, concerning which so much has been said here, that no person shall be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb, that no man shall be deprived of his property without due process of law, that no man shall be deprived of his religious liberty, that no man shall be deprived of the right of trial by jury. I take it that in the Territory of Alaska, where there is no self-government, those rights are all safeguarded.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. TILLMAN. Do those rights, which the Senator has just given us a list of, include the right to move from one part of this country to another?

Mr. SPOONER. I think so.

Mr. TILLMAN. From the Territories into the States?

Mr. SPOONER. I think so.

Mr. TILLMAN. In other words, the annexation of the Philippines would carry with it the right, under the law and the Constitution, for any one of those people to come here?

Mr. SPOONER. I think so. I do not care to discuss that now, but for the purposes of what I have to say I am disposed to admit it.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. They have that right now.

Mr. SPOONER. We could exclude them now, and possibly we could then. Until they are excluded by law, every one has a right to come here. Whether we could prevent the people of a Territory from leaving the Territory, or prevent them from going into one of our States, I do not care to discuss. The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] thinks we could. I have grave doubts about it.

This thing, I think, is true, Mr. President, that the status of persons whose allegiance to another power is changed by a transfer of territory to us is fixed by the treaty primarily. Congress may change it. Ordinarily a treaty is a mere compact between nations. A treaty under our Constitution is more than that; it is the supreme law of the land; it is a law made only by the President and a part of this body; but it is just as much the law of the land, defining and securing rights under it, as an act of Congress passed under the Constitution.

Mr. MALLORY. Subject to the Constitution, however.

Mr. SPOONER Subject to the Constitution, certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator allow me now? I do not want to interrupt him.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no objection to being interrupted, except that I want to get through. But what is the Senator's question?

Mr. TILLMAN. It is this: Under the treaty, if we ratify it, everybody will concede, I believe, that those people would owe allegiance to this Government and obedience to its laws?

Mr. SPOONER. Until the treaty is ratified?

Mr. TILLMAN. After its ratification. Does anybody deny that?

Mr. SPOONER. Well; admit it.

Mr. TILLMAN. You admitted the other, and I would not have interrupted you if the Senator from Connecticut had not.

Mr. SPOONER. Admit it.

Mr. TILLMAN. You admit that the right which we obtain over the lives and property of those people must carry with it the corollary right of those people to be protected by our laws to the extent of going where they please in this country?

Mr. SPOONER. That rather begs the question.

Now, take the case of Hawaii. There had been a government which we had recognized as a government; the other nations of the world had recognized it as an independent government; Congress acquired it by joint resolution; but it was not thought that the Constitution and the laws of the United States ex proprio vigore extended over it. Congress put this provision in the act, and it is found in substance in almost all similar acts:

> Until Congress shall provide for the government of such islands all the civil, judicial, and military powers exercised by the officers of the existing government in said islands shall be vested in such person or persons and shall be exercised in such manner as the President of the United States shall direct, and the President shall have power to remove said officers and fill the vacancies so occasioned.

I am reading from a part of the Hawaiian annexation resolution.

Mr. TILLMAN. I thought the Senator had acknowledged that he believed the annexation of Hawaii by resolution was unconstitutional.

Mr. SPOONER. What of it? It is a political act not reviewable by the courts.

Mr. TILLMAN. I understood you a moment ago to say that you had never heard the argument of the Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] answered.

Mr. SPOONER. What has that to do with what I have just read?

Mr. TILLMAN. Did you not read a part of the resolution under which Hawaii was annexed?

Mr. SPOONER. I did.

Mr. TILLMAN. And you declared that that resolution was unconstitutional?

Mr. SPOONER. I have not overturned the Government by declaring that. [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator is disposed to grow splenetic and cross because I am trying to get some light, being a mere layman without any especial knowledge of law except what I can absorb by contact with my learned brethren here, of course I will not trouble him any further.

Mr. SPOONER. Congress thought the act constitutional, and a great many very distinguished gentlemen think so now, and in the view that it was constitutional and within the constitutional capacity of Congress, they passed it.

Mr. TILLMAN. And against the protest of the Senator from Wisconsin.

Mr. SPOONER. I am not interested in that question now. This is not a personal matter.

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course not.

Mr. SPOONER. And they included in that joint resolution this provision for the government of Hawaii until Congress shall provide a government which is in harmony with all similar acts from the beginning of the Government down to now, except that this is broader.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator please enlighten me further as to whether in any previous act of Congress there has ever been any effort made to limit the power of a citizen of a Territory to go wherever he pleased under the jurisdiction of the flag; in other words, to go from one part of the United States to another?

Mr. SPOONER. Well, I would rather take the contract of arguing these questions than of enlightening, or trying to enlighten, my friend from South Carolina on matters which are not relevant.

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will permit me further, I will say that my individual objection, and the most strenuous I have, to annexing these people by treaty, is the very fact that here are 10,000,000 Asiatics who will have the right, as soon as the pending treaty is ratified, to get on the first ship that they can reach and come here and compete in the labor market of the United States, if they see fit, or if capitalists see fit to import them.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I have no doubt whatever of the power of the Government of the United States to accept this cession; I have no doubt whatever of the power of the Congress to govern the Philippine Archipelago, as it has governed other territory of the United States, at its own will, so far as local government is concerned. There is no doubt of the power of the President—and I think perhaps an act should be passed as in the case of Louisiana and Florida—to govern there until Congress shall provide a form of government; and at the same time I see nothing in this contention inconsistent at all with the carrying to the people of that archipelago and the enforcement there of all these great personal rights guaranteed by the Constitution—the right of habeas corpus, the right of trial by jury, and the like.

Now, if we take this cession, upon what theory do we take it? In my view we take it as a conquest.

Mr. DANIEL. Will the honorable Senator from Wisconsin allow me to ask him a question? I am very much interested in his remarks. Does the Senator think that the tax laws of the United States in respect to uniformity would stretch eo instanti over those islands?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not. The Supreme Court of the United States, I think, settled that question in the case of Fleming vs. Page and in the case of Cross vs. Harrison. In both those cases it was settled. Whether after Congress has passed an act for the government of that territory it having become a part of the United States this clause of the Constitution which requires duties, imposts, and excises to be uniform would preclude us from passing a tariff as against importations from the archipelago seems to me to be a close question.

It might very well be decided either way. On the strength of the opinion of Chief Justice Marshall in Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheat., 317), it would be without our power; but I think, in view of later decisions, in view of the use of the word "State" in the Constitution in that connection, in all probability it is the law that the Congress would have the power to protect the labor of this country and subserve the interest of the people of this country by imposing duties upon importations from those islands. How the court would decide it I do not know, and that doubt is one element of anxiety and trouble to me in this whole proposition.

I was saying, when interrupted, that we take this by this cession as a conquest. We have, it is true, occupied very little in a military way of the Philippine Archipelago—only Manila Bay, the harbor and the city of Manila. That, of course, was the capital of the country. That is the great commercial city of the archipelago. It is the entrepôt and the distributing point. It is where the government was, and whether a broad view expressed here at one time that by capturing the capital we have in contemplation of international law captured the archipelago, I do not care to discuss now.

The word "conquest," as I understand it, is not used in the narrow sense expressed by the doctrine uti possidetis. Under international law, if a treaty of peace is made, territory occupied by the enemy's troops, the treaty being silent upon the subject, goes to the occupying enemy under the doctrine of uti possidetis. But that is not at all the limit of conquest. At the end of the Mexican war we acquired by cession from Mexico a very large tract of country, now States in the Union, and of the wealthiest, most prosperous, and intelligent in the Union. Under the doctrine of uti possidetis we would have acquired comparatively little of that territory. But in the treaty of cession it was ceded to us as a conquest.

The doctrine of conquest applies not simply to territory exacted or seized by military force, but it extends also to territory acquired by moral force.

Webster defines the word conquest:

> The act or process of conquering, or acquiring by force; the act of overcoming or subduing opposition by force, whether physical or moral; subjection; subjugation; victory. 2. That which is conquered; possession gained by force, physical or moral.

Mexico lay at our feet. Mexico did not voluntarily transfer to the United States that vast domain. We paid some millions for it, but it was not a sale. Mexico ceded it because it was exacted of her by a victor, and it was and has been referred to in the decisions of the Supreme Court, in the Fleming case and in the case of Cross vs. Harrison, as a ceded conquest. So while we occupy very little of the Philippine Archipelago, the acquisition of this territory is, under the treaty, by right of conquest. Spain did not yield it to us willingly. Spain, the published proceedings show, sought to retain it. It comes to us because Spain was the vanquished and we were the victor and in position to demand indemnity. It comes to us as indemnity. A territory exacted from a conquered enemy as indemnity and passed by cession is just as much acquired by conquest as if it had been in fact occupied by the military forces.

It has been said here in open debate that Spain has no right to cede to us. I deny it. For three hundred and eighty years Spain had been the owner of the Philippine Archipelago, in possession of it, governing it. As long ago as 1801 we established a consulate at Manila, and from that day until the declaration of war we had a consul at Manila representing the United States and holding his exequatur from the Kingdom of Spain. We established consular agencies at Cebu, Iloilo, and at one other point in the island. Spain, during her tenure in the Philippines and her sovereignty there, has not been without attack. She was attacked by the Dutch. She was attacked by Great Britain. Manila was captured and Manila was looted—a dreadful record—and the whole archipelago was surrendered to the British authorities.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to interrupt him for a moment?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. Although the paper title is in Spain, although she is the titular sovereign, do not the published statements show that Spain never has conquered more than half those islands?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not think so. I know that Spain, when Manila was captured, surrendered the entire archipelago to Great Britain, and that in a little time, under another treaty of Paris, the entire archipelago was surrendered by Great Britain back to Spain.

Mr. CAFFERY. That may be true. But if the Senator will permit me, that does not show at all that Spain had the whole sovereignty over the islands. I ask the Senator whether the published statement does not show that not more than one-half of those people have ever been conquered by the Spanish.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not so understand it. I understand, and the world has so understood it, and the world has so treated it, that the archipelago covered by the treaty of cession has for three hundred years, barring the interval I have mentioned, belonged to Spain and has been under the sovereignty of Spain. There may be islands there inhabited by cannibals, for all I know; inhabited by men who have a little government of their own; wild men, half civilized or uncivilized people; but that does not go at all, I think, to dispute the proposition I make, that up to the day when Dewey broke the power of Spain in the Philippines she was acknowledged the whole world over as the titular sovereign of that archipelago. I do not know of anyone who can claim a better title. There have been rebellions there. I have a list of them here, but I shall not take the time to read them. Tribe after tribe, during the last three hundred years, has rebelled against the power of Spain in those islands.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to interrupt him again?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. The Senator from Wisconsin has stated that Dewey broke the power of Spain in those islands. But did he not break the power of Spain in those islands by the assistance of the Filipinos, who claim that Spain never has conquered them?

Mr. SPOONER. I will get to that point in a few moments. Every revolt against Spain which has been made in those islands has been put down by military force—every one, except perhaps the revolt of 1896. And when the great naval battle occurred in Manila Bay, Spain was the governing power in the Philippine Archipelago. There was no organized rebellion there, so far as I can learn. Aguinaldo, against whom I have nothing to say, and many of his chieftains, around whom some of the people had rallied, had taken themselves away, some have said under promise of pay. I have a book here by Dean C. Worcester, in which the statement is made that that rebellion or revolt was overcome in large part by bribing the leaders and by promises of reform, and only a portion of the money was paid and only a few of the reforms carried forward. But it seems to be perfectly clear, and that is the point of my suggestion, that when the battle of Manila Bay occurred there was no revolt in the archipelago; there was no pretended government, either, in the archipelago.

There is such a thing in international law, in its relation to national titles, as prescription. It is very much the same as the doctrine of prescription applied to individual title. I do not wish to take the time to read them, for I must hasten, but I have authorities here upon the subject. David Dudley Field suggested that fifty years ought to be agreed upon by nations as the period of prescription. It has been held one way and another, but it never has been thought that a government holding sway over a territory, the only sovereign nation there, governing, tyrannically as even Spain has, for three hundred years, or for a hundred years, or for fifty years, could have anything less than a solid prescriptive right to the title and to the sovereignty.

Mr. CAFFERY. Then the longer the tyranny the stronger the title?

Mr. SPOONER. I do not say that, and the Senator from Louisiana knows that I do not mean that. Unsuccessful resistance to tyranny, the Senator knows, does not displace a sovereignty or interfere with prescription. A successful rebellion, which is revolution, will do it—it interrupts the possession. But a resistance, revolt after revolt, which is not successful, does not do it, and never but by the English during the time of Spain's sovereignty in those islands has that sovereignty been displaced.

Mr. TILLMAN. Will the Senator from Wisconsin allow me?

Mr. SPOONER. I speak under embarrassment, because I do not like to take the time of the Senate.

Mr. TILLMAN. I dislike very much to obtrude myself on the Senator, but we have a rule here, by common consent, that if a Senator has not completed his speech when the hour of 2 o'clock arrives, he has unanimous consent to go on, and there will be no objection to listening to the eloquent Senator from Wisconsin. But he just now made a statement——

The VICE-PRESIDENT. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield to the Senator from South Carolina?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator just now made a statement which if he had been in the Senate yesterday he would not have made. I read, from the documents sent us with the treaty, a letter from Mr. Williams, the consul of the United States at Manila, under date of February 22:

> Peace was proclaimed, and since my coming festivities therefor were held; but there is no peace, and has been none for about two years. Conditions here and in Cuba are practically alike. War exists, battles are of almost daily occurrence, ambulances bring in many wounded, and hospitals are full.

Then, under date of March 19, the same consul says:

> Insurrection is rampant; many killed, wounded, and made prisoners on both sides.

And so on, in half a dozen places in different letters during the month of March, six weeks before Dewey entered Manila Bay, we have evidence from our own consul that there was an insurrection of large proportions and a larger number of insurgents together in one body than ever were found together in Cuba.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I think I have no occasion to qualify my statement, and that without reflecting upon Mr. Williams.

Mr. TILLMAN. The consul; not me.

Mr. SPOONER. I did not say the Senator from South Carolina. Of course I was not reflecting upon the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. TILLMAN. I beg pardon. I thought the Senator said the Senator from South Carolina.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, Aguinaldo, a great leader in all this business——

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator from Wisconsin had been in the Senate yesterday he would also have had that whole subject ventilated, with the official documents going to prove that Aguinaldo had left, carrying with him a certain fund in trust for the Filipinos conditional upon the Spaniards granting concessions and relieving the Filipinos of some of that tyranny; that he returned under Dewey's invitation, and that as soon as he reached Manila and landed there, furnished, as our ally, with arms by Dewey, the insurrection assumed such proportions that the island of Luzon slipped from the grasp of the Spaniards at once, and a government was formed, and it is in existence to-day.

Mr. SPOONER. Is not the Senator from South Carolina telling something that happened in executive session? [Laughter.]

Mr. TILLMAN. Yes, sir, I am; but it comes, if the Senator will allow me, from the official documents, which are published and which I could reproduce here without any charge of bad faith with my brethren.

Mr. SPOONER. I am sorry I have to tell the Senator that that was a joke.

Mr. President, the fact remains, as shown by the Senator from South Carolina, that the leader of the Philippine revolt was not there up to the time of Dewey's arrival.

Mr. TILLMAN. The present leader.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes; the present leader, the great leader, the man who had been conducting the revolt, the man with whom the Governor-General had made the terms of pacification, the man who was intrusted with the fund, the fruits of that negotiation. He was not at the head of the troops. He was not leading a revolt. He and his chieftains, as stated by Dean C. Worcester, an entirely reliable and, I think, accurate man, had gone away from the archipelago. Speaking of that, he says:

> Their early successes, their retreat to the mountains, the fearful mortality caused by the climate among the Spanish troops sent against them, "their pacification" by promises of reform and by the bribing of their leaders, as well as the failure of the Governor-General to carry out his promises to them, are all matters of common knowledge.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Oh!

Mr. TILLMAN. Of course I will not proceed if the Senator objects.

Mr. SPOONER. I have no objection, but——

Mr. TILLMAN. Unless the Senator withdraws any imputation upon the patriotism and honesty and good faith of Aguinaldo, I will be constrained to read what is stated about him here to disprove what he has charged in the RECORD.

Mr. SPOONER. What have I charged in the RECORD? I stated that I had nothing whatever to say against Aguinaldo. What I have read here does not mention Aguinaldo.

Mr. TILLMAN. The Senator's first mention of him was in a belittling and sneering way.

Mr. SPOONER. I do not know of any reason——

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will just endure me one more minute——

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator from Aguinaldo [laughter] will permit me to go on and finish my remarks, I will be obliged to him.

The VICE-PRESIDENT. The Senator from Wisconsin is entitled to the floor.

Mr. SPOONER. I can not stop to have an issue made with me upon the question whether I referred in terms of adequate respect to Aguinaldo. That is outside the question. The Senator, of course, will be at liberty to make such reply to me in that respect as he chooses. I was ill all day yesterday; I have never hesitated about interruptions, and I am only anxious now to go on with my remarks both on account of the time of the Senate, which it requires, and because of my own condition.

Mr. TILLMAN. Under those circumstances I will even endure without reply the sneer of being a Senator from Aguinaldo.

Mr. SPOONER. I withdraw that remark. The Senator seemed to be very much aroused in behalf of the dignity of Aguinaldo, and I used the phrase which I ought not to have used and which I withdraw.

Mr. President, if I may be permitted to proceed, I have no doubt myself that Spain, when this treaty was made, was fairly to be considered as the titular sovereign of the Philippine Archipelago. Certainly until the battle of Manila Bay Spain was there with her troops, there at her capital, there with her Governor-General, there with her administration, and not only there, but in other cities in the archipelago; and the mere fact that afterwards in a war with Spain, even with the assistance of Aguinaldo and some of his followers, we destroyed the Spanish fleet and took possession of the capital city does not, in my judgment, constitute the attempt by Aguinaldo and some of his followers to set up a tin-horn government there as having any effect upon the status so far as the title of Spain is concerned in her dealing with this Government.

Whom Aguinaldo represents I do not know. There are 8,000,000 people there, it is said. What his alleged government is nobody knows. What its character is nobody knows. It was set up at a time when we were taking care of Spain and when there was no occasion for revolt. How far it represents the people of that island I do not know, nor does the Senator. It is stated in the testimony given before the commissioners at Paris that Aguinaldo and his followers, I think, represent less than 1 per cent of the people who are to be subjected to any government established in the archipelago.

It is not enough to "set up" a government. It is not enough to "whistle" followers around it. It must be a government capable of discharging its obligations, domestic and international, and there is no such government there, and never has been any such government there except the Government of Spain. I think the people of the United States by this cession and by the grant by Spain of the title and sovereignty to the archipelago acquire a title to it and a right of sovereignty over it which among nations is good.

A great point is made against the ratification of the treaty upon the theory that it violates the Declaration of Independence, particularly that phrase in the Declaration which asserts that "all government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed." No one, I presume, will deny the philosophical truth of that declaration. I am not here to deny it. It has always seemed to me that the assertion, with one or two others conjoined with it, were intended to be the basis of the doctrine a little later announced in the Declaration of the right of revolution.

One who reads that instrument carefully can not, I think, fail to see that it is stated as one of the foundations upon which the right of revolution is based; and as a whole it means that no people are obliged by any rule to submit forever to tyranny, and that the time comes when, in the exercise of rights which come not from constitutions, which come not from men, but which come from God, a people may rise in their might and disrupt the relations which theretofore had existed between them and the Government which has oppressed them.

It is like the declaration "All men are born equal." Philosophically and in a subtle and abstract sense that is true. In the world, in the practical life of the world, it is not true, and it never has been true. The Senator from Alabama [Mr. MORGAN], who always chooses exquisite and accurate phrase to express his thought, I remember, during the debate on the Cuban resolution, spoke of the Declaration of Independence as a high political declaration. That is the language, as I remember it. But, Mr. President, it happens that "in the corrupted currents of this world" it is impossible for men or for nations in all their conduct to be governed by strict abstract right.

Never since the foundation of this Government have we in the acquisition of territory paid the slightest attention to the "consent of the governed." Thomas Jefferson, who, as the author of that great Declaration, won undying fame, was the first man under our Government to violate it by the acquisition of Louisiana. No one asked the consent of the inhabitants there to a transfer of their allegiance or a transfer of the territory.

The same thing was true of Florida. The same thing was true at the end of the Mexican war when we acquired California, Utah, and the territory west of the Missouri. Who ever asked the consent of those people?

There have been many instances in our history, not related entirely to territory, either, in which as a matter of practical affairs that abstraction could not be regarded. I can not stop to mention them, nor do I care to. It never can be until the millennium comes. It never can be while government is intrusted to men and holds sway over men. It never can be until perfection comes into life, and until the weaknesses, the passions, the violence, the faults, and the foibles of our common humanity are eliminated.

Take the case of Hawaii. I was not in favor, as I have said, of the annexation of Hawaii. It was done by a joint resolution of Congress. Did anyone pay any attention to the consent of the governed? A protest by the inhabitants of those islands, numbering, I think, 14,000 or thereabouts, was presented by the senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] against annexation. They loved their own country; they wanted their own little independent republic out on those islands in the Pacific sea; they sought no annexation to the United States. But, Mr. President, without regard to this Declaration of Independence, our people annexed those islands and transferred their allegiance to us. More than that. The Senator from Georgia [Mr. BACON] offered an amendment to the annexation resolutions, which reads as follows:

> That this resolution shall not be operative and of binding effect upon either the United States of America or the Republic of Hawaii until the same shall have been consented to and approved by the majority of the voters voting at an election to be held in the Hawaiian Islands, at which election all male natives of said islands of the age of 21 years, and all naturalized male persons in said islands of the age of 21 years, shall be duly qualified voters. The said election shall be held at a time and in the manner and under regulations to be prescribed by the President of the United States.

That was voted down. I was not at liberty to vote, but I announced that if not paired I should vote for it. The senior Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. HOAR] is recorded as voting against it. I do not call attention to that to reflect upon any Senator or any Member of Congress. I call attention to it only as warrant for my proposition, that never has this Government in the acquisition of territory paid the slightest attention to "the consent of the governed."

But there is another thing about it. The doctrine that no territory shall be acquired without the consent of the governed never has been and never can be admitted into international law. It never has been, and so long as the law of conquest exists, it never can be permitted a place in peace negotiation or treaty. It is said by Hall:

> The rights of a State with respect to property consist of the right to acquire territory, in being entitled to peaceable possession and enjoyment of that which it has duly obtained, and in the faculty of using its property as it chooses and alienating it at will. * * * The principle that the wishes of the population are to be consulted when the territory which they inhabit is ceded has not yet been adopted into international law, and can not be adopted into it until title by conquest has disappeared.

Suppose at the end of the Mexican war, when we were exacting territory from Mexico as indemnity or by conquest, whichever you please, we had been obliged to put it to a vote in the territory proposed to be ceded whether we should be permitted to take it or not? Upon that doctrine no government ever could acquire territory by conquest or territorial indemnity at the end of a war.

Suppose at the end of our great war, when we all thought that we had casus belli against Great Britain, happily now at peace with us, not simply as to the two Governments, but as to the two peoples, a peace and friendship which I hope will last forever, which in the interest of each ought to last forever, and which our people and their people never should permit to be broken or weakened—suppose at the end of our war that instead of disbanding the Federal Army, instead of sending our Navy out of commission, we had chosen to call England to account, and had engaged in war with her, marched our troops across the line which divides the British possessions from the United States, occupied a portion of it by our troops, carried on the war until a peace had been agreed upon, and in that treaty of peace Canada and the British possessions had been ceded to the United States, partly as indemnity and partly for money, who would have thought that that could not become effective under the Constitution read in the light of the Declaration of Independence without submitting to a vote of the people of Canada the question whether we should take that territory as indemnity or not?

And if you must submit it, to whom must you submit it? The Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] the other day, in his speech, when asked whether government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed, said, "From some of the governed;" and he was called to account for that—I was about to say lampooned—not once, but many times. I dare to assert here to-day that the Senator's answer was absolutely accurate. It is some of the governed who consent to government everywhere. There is only one place in the world I know of where the exercise of power depends upon the unanimous consent of the governed, and that is the Senate of the United States. [Laughter.]

Mr. CAFFERY. In the case supposed by the Senator, would we take Canada without the consent of any of the governed?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir; we would have taken Canada without the consent of any of the governed. If we could not take territory as indemnity at the end of a war, if we could not take territory as a conquest without asking the consent of some of the governed, we could not take it at all; and at this day, while we all desire war to be averted, I apprehend no one, even the citizens of this peace-loving Republic, would be willing to have announced and adopted as a policy of ours a limitation in the event if we are forced into a war which applies to no other government.

We must not shackle ourselves. War is wicked. War is brutal. Some one has said it is "organized brutality." It is pitiless. But nations sometimes must engage in it. This Republic was obliged to engage in it, in the opinion of Congress, since sustained, I think, by the public opinion of the United States. When it is waged we, as other nations, must be free to deal with the conditions of peace as best protects our interests.

This is true, too, Mr. President, after all, that as wicked and wasteful and desolating as it is, it has many times happened, and will happen many times again, that only out of the soil made rich by the blood and the ashes of war can the beautiful flowers of liberty blossom.

And so, not looking at it from the philosophical standpoint, not dealing with it as a mere abstraction, dealing with it as practical men, the servants of a practical people, with a momentous duty imposed upon us, I say that in this case the doctrine invoked from the Declaration of Independence has no place.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin permit me to ask him a question?

Mr. SPOONER. Yes, sir.

Mr. BACON. I desire to ask the Senator a question with refence to the supposed case of Canada. Suppose that at the time indicated by him Canada had been in rebellion against the mother country, and had set up a de facto government and had been engaged with us in a common war against Great Britain, and at the conclusion of that war announced to the world its desire to be free and to have an independent government; if upon the conclusion of the war with Great Britian, which the Senator has supposed, we had entered into a treaty by which we took a cession of Canada, under those circumstances and against her will, would the Senator from Wisconsin say that that was or was not in contravention of the principle announced in the Declaration of Independence, that the consent of the governed is necessary?

Mr. SPOONER. I would not say it was.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. PENROSE in the chair). The hour of 2 o'clock having arrived, the Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business, which will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

Mr. CAFFERY. I ask unanimous consent that the Senator from Wisconsin be permitted to finish his remarks.

Mr. FAULKNER. I desire to correct that by simply saying that by the unanimous consent already given the Senator from Wisconsin has a right to continue until the close of his speech.

Mr. BACON. Yes; that is right.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Wisconsin will proceed.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, what I mean by saying that is this: Nations are selfish. They must be selfish or they can not live. I do not mean grasping and overweening of necessity, but they must look to their own interests and the interests of their own people. I think if we had in a war with Great Britain, notwithstanding rebellion upon the part of Canada, acquired that territory by cession, our people would not have felt that there should be another independent government so near to us on this continent, and all abstractions would have been disregarded.

Mr. BACON. That would be another reason, then.

Mr. SPOONER. No; that would be reason for making that an exception. But it is not a parallel case at all. There is no similarity even between the case put by the Senator from Georgia and the situation in the Philippine Archipelago, as I understand the facts.

But, Mr. President, how does it happen that distinguished Senators who have so much to say about the "consent of the governed" in its relation to our constitutional and moral right to take this cession have nothing to say about it as to Porto Rico; offer no amendments declaring the purpose of this Government concerning Porto Rico; raise no question of constitutionality as to our right to acquire and permanently hold Porto Rico? Does the constitutional power depend upon the number of marine leagues a territory may be from the mainland? Does the declaration that "government derives its just powers from the consent of the governed" not apply to a million people as well as to ten million?

Mr. CAFFERY. I will ask the Senator, if he will permit me, whether it is not a fact that the Porto Ricans welcomed our army with banners flying and with every manifestation of consent to our Government.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, it has seemed to me a very strange thing that in all this debate no man has had one word to say against our acquisition of Porto Rico under this treaty and the annexation of it to the United States, so far as the treaty does it, and the government of it by the United States.

Mr. MASON. Mr. President, will the Senator from Wisconsin pardon me?

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator's resolution would cover Porto Rico.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. But he has not said it.

Mr. SPOONER. He did not mention it, but his general proposition would apply to it. Now, Mr. President——

Mr. BACON. Mr. President——

Mr. SPOONER. Pardon me. The Senator from Louisiana [Mr. CAFFERY] asked me whether it is true or not that our troops in Porto Rico were welcomed with hospitable hands and flying banners and all that. Possibly so. I think any people in the world who knew anything would welcome an American army after living under Spain.

Mr. CAFFERY. They do not know enough.

Mr. SPOONER. If they do not know enough they will soon learn.

It almost always happens—it happened many times in the South during the war, when the lines were changing, that the people received with hospitality and without apparent enmity the army which they considered an invading army. They did it under an impulse which is as natural as it is to breathe, that they should give no offense, that they should conciliate an overweening force, that they should safeguard their property if possible and their families and their interest. In the same way, very likely, Mr. President, the Porto Ricans welcomed the Army of the United States. But if they welcomed our invading army with shouts and with flags, did they abdicate their right to have a voice in the government of their own country? Does that take them out from this doctrine of the Declaration of Independence? No, Mr. President; it is proposed to take this cession of Porto Rico without asking the Porto Ricans whether they consent or not.

Mr. HOAR. Oh, no.

Mr. SPOONER. How is that?

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I took the liberty of saying "Oh, no." I have never myself supposed there was the slightest distinction in principle between Porto Rico and the Philippines.

Mr. SPOONER. Of course there is not, so far as our Declaration of Independence is concerned.

Mr. HOAR. The only reason why we have not dealt with Porto Rico is because we took the one conspicuous example, the worst one for our people; but the doctrine which has been argued applies to the whole, unquestionably.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. HOAR. Anyone who believes in the application of the doctrine to the Philippines I suppose believes in the application of it to Porto Rico. I do certainly.

Mr. GALLINGER. Why not Hawaii?

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, we did not ask them. It has not been proposed here to eliminate from this treaty the cession of Porto Rico.

Mr. HOAR. It will be, when we get to it.

Mr. SPOONER. The resolution introduced by the Senator from Massachusetts [MR. HOAR] is limited to the Philippines. It is a declaration of the policy of the United States only as to the Philippines. It is as silent as the grave as to Porto Rico.

Mr. BACON. Will the Senator from Wisconsin pardon me? I dislike very much to interrupt him, and will endeavor not to do so again; but as what the Senator says about Porto Rico is in some measure a reply to the inquiry propounded by me, I desire to say a word in response to his suggestion that we are inconsistent in making no effort as to Porto Rico. I think, Mr. President, that the attitude of the United States in that particular is entirely justified upon the ground that the continued possession by Spain of any West India island is recognized as inimical to the interests and to the peace of this country, and for that reason, on the ground of the safety of this country and the future peace of this country, not only has the Government of the United States made that demand as to Porto Rico, but as to all the other West India possessions of Spain.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, I thank the Senator from Georgia. He has in a single sentence made a more powerful argument in support of my contention than I could ever hope to make. He says that the Declaration of Independence is suspended in the West Indies. Why? Because it is for the interest of the United States.

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. I beg the Senator's pardon; not the interest.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. BACON. To the public safety, which goes beyond interest.

Mr. SPOONER. Oh, the United States, Mr. President, is interested in its public safety. [Laughter.]

Mr. BACON. There are a great many things, however, that are to the interest of the country which are not essential to its safety.

Mr. SPOONER. But this is the particular thing that we are talking about, Mr. President; not a great many other things.

The Senator justifies the taking of Porto Rico, as he must, without asking the consent of the inhabitants. Otherwise we could not probably take it at all. He bases his justification upon the fact, for it is a fact, that we require it in our business; in other words, that we regard it——

Mr. BACON. The Senator must take my words, and not use other words. I say necessary, not for our interest, not for our business, but essential to our safety. Now, if the Senator will use that word, I will stand by it; and I will say further that I go fully with him to the extent——

Mr. SPOONER. Spain occupied it for one hundred and twenty years and we were safe.

Mr. BACON. To the extent that the acquisition of territory necessary to our safety is perfectly justifiable under the Declaration of Independence and our Constitution.

Mr. SPOONER. The Senator has surrendered.

Mr. BACON. Safety, not interest.

Mr. SPOONER. I accept his surrender.

Mr. BACON. No.

Mr. SPOONER. Mr. President, there is no escape from it. That is the principle upon which nations transact business.

Mr. BACON. If the Senator can show that the Philippines are essential to our safety, I am with him.

Mr. SPOONER. Wait a moment. It is the same sort of selfishness which leads a man to prefer the interest of his own children to the interest of the public. It is the same sort of selfishness that leads a man to safeguard his own home. It is the foundation of all society. It is the one thing that we ought never to lose sight of. We ought to legislate and we ought to deal, where we can, with reference primarily to the interests of our people, not to the interest of any other people, not to please any other Government.

But where do you find in the Declaration of Independence anything to warrant this modification suggested as to Porto Rico? We may take Porto Rico; we ought to take it; we have taken it, and we propose to keep it. But for the life of me, from the standpoint of the citizens of Porto Rico, and from the standpoint of men who claim rights which it is asserted here are God-given, even if we need Porto Rico, I can not see how we can take it without their consent. You must apply this doctrine all around or not at all. If it has no place in the practical affairs of life, governmental and otherwise, say so. The right asserted in the Declaration of Independence can not be suspended in the West Indies and potential in the Philippines. If it is a right which in the sight of God must be always respected by nations, no nation can honorably disregard it for any selfish purpose, whether it be for safety or something else. It can not be a vital, living principle in the Pacific and a discarded abstraction in the Atlantic.

Now, Mr. President, it is said that we commit a breach of faith by taking a cession of the Philippine Archipelago.

Mr. HALE. Before the Senator passes from that part of his speech, let me see if he will not agree with me that there is a very great and marked distinction between assuming the possession and control of Porto Rico and the Philippine Archipelago.

Mr. SPOONER. Yes.

Mr. HALE. I do not put it on constitutional grounds; I do not put it upon the ground of the doctrine of the Declaration of Independence; but it seems to me that possibly the island of Porto Rico may be fairly considered as an indemnity in war.

That is of some possible good to us; of some possible value; not in any way connected with grave complications and dangers in the future which would make it worse than valueless to us; while upon the great question of policy, not discussing these other questions, in my belief the Philippines not only would be no indemnity, not only would be no basis in value for the $20,000,000 paid by us, but would be an ever-blighting curse and woe to us. All the complications that would arise by the possession on our part of Oriental islands, of the danger of constant war there, of our being led into a war of subjugation against the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands make the gravest distinction, not upon the question of the Constitution or the Declaration of Independence, but as a matter of wise policy for the future. In view of all that, does not the Senator see that there is a very marked distinction between taking Porto Rico and taking the Philippine Archipelago?

Mr. SPOONER. I could have answered the question at the end of the Senator's speech in half a second.

Mr. HALE. Answer it now.

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. HALE. The Senator sees the grave distinction?

Mr. SPOONER. I do.

Mr. HALE. That is all.

Mr. SPOONER. I will speak of that briefly a little later on.

Mr. HOAR. The Senator has been interrupted. I do not wish to further interrupt his argument, but I wish, if he will permit me, to state my personal position in one sentence, as he has alluded to me.

Mr. SPOONER. Very well.

Mr. HOAR. I think that the same doctrine precisely is applicable to Porto Rico as to the Philippine Islands, and I expect to resist everywhere the acquiring of a people to be held without their consent, or to be held permanently as colonies or dependencies, not to be incorporated into the Union.

The reason my resolution was confined to the Philippine Islands was this: I wished to bring into sharp contrast with the doctrines of the Declaration of Independence an attempt by the United States to subjugate an unwilling people in arms, and therefore, there being other resolutions like those of the Senator from Georgia [MR. BACON] that covered other phases of the question, I introduced a resolution aimed at what I regard as a proposition and purpose to make war on the people of the Philippine Islands for their subjugation, and to bring that extreme into sharp contrast with what I suppose to be the opinion of the people of the United States in respect to these doctrines of the Declaration of Independence. But I did not leave out the people of Porto Rico from that resolution with any thought that we were justified in doing as to Porto Rico what we are not justified in doing as to the Philippines. On the contrary, I do not agree that the safety of the United States is in the least dependent on a little island down in the West Indies.

Mr. SPOONER. Nor, I suppose, does the Senator believe that upon the safety of the United States depends the right of the people to be consulted as to their government, as the Senator from Georgia seems to think?

Mr. HOAR. No; not the least in the world. I only wanted to put myself right, if the Senator will excuse me for interrupting him.

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly. After all, Mr. President, if there is an absolute right residing in people to be always consulted as to their government, it is a personal right, which belongs to them, and one which no government could honorably take away from them for any selfish purpose, whether it involves its safety or involves the promotion of its business success. The truth is, and there is no way out of it, that at the end of a war in the acquisition of territory taken as indemnity and conquest we must take it without consulting the people, or not take it at all, and this doctrine is inadmissible from the national standpoint. The same thing must be true as to acquisition by purchase. It is very doubtful if we could have acquired either Louisiana or Florida if first required to obtain the consent of the inhabitants.

Porto Rico has become, with the development of our country, of great importance to us. It stands as an important outpost. Its relation to the Caribbean Sea and to the great waterway connecting the two oceans, which this nation is determined to have, is such that we ought to possess it and defend it and take care of it, giving to the people there as much of self-government as is possible. It is not very far away.

It is said, and believed by a great many, that to accept a cession of the Philippine Islands—and if that be true as to the Philippine Islands, it is equally true as to Porto Rico—is to break the solemn pledge of the United States and thereby to dishonor its name. It is asserted that we went into the war declaring by resolution to all the world that our purpose was a holy purpose only; that it was not a war for conquest; that its sole object was to bring freedom to the people of Cuba. That statement is partly true; but in my view it is too broad to be entirely true in its relation to this subject.

Here is the resolution drawn and offered by the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], and he deserves the thanks of the people of this country for drawing it, and for drawing it just as he did:

Fourth. That the United States hereby disclaims any disposition or intention to exercise sovereignty, jurisdiction, or control over said island—except for the pacification thereof, and asserts its determination, when that is accomplished, to leave the government and control of the island to its people.

Why was that declaration made by the Congress of the United States? It was made to put this country right in the eyes of the world before entering upon the war. There were a great many, including my friend from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER], who believed we had just cause for war against Spain on our own account; there were many people in the United States who felt that because of the destruction of the Maine we, without regard to Cuba, were justified in engaging Spain in war. There were others who felt that with all the horrors of that explosion, without any doubt that it was external, without any doubt that Spaniards were responsible for it, nevertheless there was not evidence of complicity upon the part of Spain to warrant a dignified nation in assuming a fact not established and basing a declaration of war upon it.

Mr. PETTUS. Mr. President, I ask leave to ask the Senator from Wisconsin a question.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Does the Senator from Wisconsin yield?

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. PETTUS. Has the Senator forgotten that we had positive proof before the Teller resolution or any other resolution of that character was passed that the soldiers of Spain in Havana, where there was no war going on, had murdered very many of our citizens?

Mr. SPOONER. I had forgotten that, but that would not be cause of war in itself if reparation were made for it upon due demand.

But what I wish to say is this: That by common consent—and I think it was wise—it was determined not to enter upon a war based upon some cause existing in our behalf against Spain, but to intervene—to intervene, Mr. President, without regard to any cause we might have for war; to intervene on high ground, because every writer on international law makes it plain that intervention in the affairs of another nation, especially between it and a revolting people, must, to be justified before the world, be as clearly as the sunlight, free from ulterior purpose, free from selfishness; and so this resolution was adopted, to make it clear to the world that in our demand as to Cuba and in the war which we proposed to wage against Spain if our demand were not granted, our purpose was only to secure liberty for Cuba and to drive out the Spanish tyranny which for so long had been not only destructive to the Cubans, but absolutely humiliating and sickening and damaging to us, and that we did not seek to acquire that island. Did it occur to anyone that by making that declaration it was intended that the war with Spain should close and leave Spain forever to be in the government of Porto Rico?

Some one has said that if Porto Rico had been added to that resolution it would have met with universal concurrence. I only speak for myself when I say it would not have met with mine. I think it would not have met with the concurrence of the American people, for I believe they would not have been satisfied to have the war brought to a close leaving a vestige of Spanish sovereignty on our eastern coast. Nor, Mr. President, was it inserted for the purpose of tying the hands of the Government of the United States when peace came, of preventing us from seeking for our citizens and for ourselves from a bankrupt Government such territorial indemnity as would fairly make good, if it could be done, the expenses of a war waged for liberty.

I am not in the slightest degree impressed by the argument that if we take a cession of Porto Rico as indemnity from Spain and a cession of the Philippine Archipelago as indemnity from Spain we violate the letter or even the spirit of this declaration. The war once entered upon, although with the highest possible purpose, was a war to the death, with all the powers and all the incidents of public war from the beginning of it to the ending of it, including the right of conquest and the right of indemnity.

Of course we can not take Cuba. I hope, for the honor of America, no man would think of such a thing. We promised the world to make Cuba free and to enforce law and order in that island until the people there could form a government. When that is done our pledge will have been splendidly redeemed.

Mr. President, some gentlemen waltz up to this proposition of territorial expansion as gaily as "the troubadour touched his guitar." I can not do it. I have not been able to persuade myself that the best interests of this country in the long run—and we ought to study its interests for the long run—are to be subserved by a policy of territorial expansion, permanent dominion over far distant lands and peoples. I do not think Porto Rico within this principle.

I am a commercial expansionist. I believe in building up the trade of the United States. I am in favor of an interoceanic canal, not only for the purposes of national defense, but for its benefit to the trade of the future. I am in favor of acquiring naval stations all over the world where the interests of this Government would be subserved thereby—resting places for our commerce. I am in favor of lines of cable connection in every conceivable direction where they would promote the interests of the United States.

I am in favor of an adequate Navy. I am in favor of all of the Army that the needs of our country from time to time require. I am in favor of upbuilding our merchant marine by the best possible means. It must be upbuilded. We can not permit any longer the vessels of other nations to control the transportation on the sea of the products of the United States. I am willing to help do it by voting for subsidies or for differential or discriminating duties—whatever is the surest and the best means to secure its accomplishment.

But, Mr. President, I shrink from the notion that the interests of this country will be subserved by making permanently a part our land territory thousands of miles away, inhabited by peoples alien to us, not of our blood, not of our way of thinking, foreign to all our associations, living in a tropical climate, where the white man can not work, under labor conditions of necessity which we would not permit to exist in the United States.

Every argument which has been made in support of this doctrine of territorial expansion—and by "territorial expansion" I mean permanent territorial expansion—seems to me to be superficial, some of them sentimental, and some of them fantastic.

The jingle of words which we read every day about "hauling down the flag" does not in the least either thrill me or impress me. Our flag has been hauled down before, Mr. President. It will be hauled down again. Where we raise it we will permit no other power on earth to haul it down, but with us it may be as honorable to haul it down as it was to raise it. It was hauled down in Mexico when hostilities ended there. If we had sent our fleet across the sea to the peninsula of Spain and captured Barcelona, raising our flag above it, it would not have been there to stay; we would have hauled it down. To-day it floats in Cuba; the Spanish flag has gone forever, but our flag is not there to stay. It floats there in sight of the poor, wrecked Maine at Havana, but there will come a day, Mr. President—and I hope it will not be long—when we will take down our flag, raised there in the cause of liberty, and leave behind it liberty and an independent government, won and established under its folds. I hope that, too, about the Philippines, and that is not at all inconsistent in my view with the ratification of the pending treaty.

It is insisted that we must have permanent territorial expansion in order to extend our trade. Mr. President, I do not think so. I have been strongly inclined to think that in the long run, with all the embarrassments and complications and dangers it will bring upon our people, it will retard rather than develop the foreign trade of the United States. We have been growing rapidly in our trade without territorial expansion. To acquire distant, nonassimilable peoples in order, through permanent dominion, to force our trade upon them seems to me to be the poorest imaginable national policy. How far will that be carried? We want the trade of the world, and we intend to have our share of it. Are we, therefore, to obtain it by carrying this doctrine of expansion to the uttermost parts of the earth? If territorial expansion means national trade, if it be necessary to national trade, where are we to stop?

I think, Mr. President, the trade of the world will go where its interest leads it in the long run, and the best avant-courier of civilization is a merchant ship, carrying the products of civilization and teaching the wants of civilization.

Permanent dominion over the Philippines by the United States as a part of this country means to me an endless and vast burden upon the industries of our people. We would be as sacredly bound to protect that distant people living under our flag in a part of our territory as we would the people living on the coast of Maine or the people living around Boston Harbor.

In the event of war the most distant outpost where our flag could be found would be the point of first attack, and we would be obliged, in my judgment, to maintain a navy adequate to protect the millions of people in the Philippines 7,000 miles away, Hawaii, and our Atlantic and Pacific coasts. If our Navy were not adequate to all that, our ships being sent far away, our home coast would be unprotected. This would involve an awful increase of taxation.

There is another thing that sometimes we lose sight of. The Senator from Rhode Island [Mr. ALDRICH] in a speech which he made here on the tariff bill asserted, and I have often thought of it, that many of our industries are coming—I think developed under the system of protection; other gentlemen think for other reasons—to that condition where we will be able to compete with the manufacturers of the other nations of the world. Our export trade is increasing day by day, and it is not confined to the products of the farm. The products of the factory and the rolling mill are increasing likewise in export.

The nation which exports largely of a given product will not derive much revenue from the duties on imports of that product; and so as the years go by, as it seems to me, we must rely less and less upon revenue derived from customs duties, and more and more upon revenue derived from internal and other taxation; and the day will come, I think, when this burden will rest heavily upon our people.

I have heard it said we must expand territorially in order to become a world power. I read it in the newspapers; I hear it in conversation. Are we, in order to be a world power, to extend our territorial limits permanently to the uttermost parts of the earth?

Mr. President, we are a world power. We have grown to be the richest nation under the sky. We are proud to feel that, taken all in all, there is no government anywhere like this. We are proud to believe that it is God's best representative of law and order and justice upon the earth. We are isolated. Other nations envy us for that. There is a tendency in this day to sneer at it and to treat it as a disadvantage. Our isolation, Mr. President, is one factor which has aided us in devoting our energies to the development of our resources only just begun; that has obliterated the frontier and made prosperous Commonwealths from ocean to ocean.

It may be, Mr. President, that the governments and peoples over the sea had begun to feel that we, in the pursuit of gain, in our devotion to the development of our industries, had lost the willingness to fight, perhaps the ability to fight. It may be they had ceased to regard us, if they ever had so regarded us, as a world power in that sense. But, Mr. President, on that glorious May morning in the far-distant Pacific, Dewey and the men behind his guns sent around the world to all governments and all peoples the never-to-be-forgotten message, "the United States is a world power." It was repeated by Sampson and Schley at Santiago, and it was again proclaimed by the thin blue line of American soldiers who sturdily climbed the hill of San Juan and who captured the heights of El Caney.

No one can well doubt that with our illimitable resources, with the pride and sense of honor characteristic of our people, with our willingness and ability to protect American interests, in the council of nations the voice of the United States will for all time have its full share of potency.

I have not been able to see that it is necessary, in order to secure a safeguarding of our national interests in our relations with the outside world, that we should forever burden our people to cover the seas with costly armadas.

We have had no participation in the struggles of the Old World nations over the balance of power. We have sympathized with them in their struggles; we have sympathized with their peoples in the terrible burdens put upon them to maintain great standing armies and great navies. But their quarrels have not been our quarrels; their policies have not been our policies. While they have fought we have fed them and manufactured products for their use.

It may not be sentimental or romantic, but it is true we have grown rich by staying at home and attending to our own business.

I have not been able to find persuasive the suggestion that we can benefit the United States by a policy which will make us in any larger sense than we are a political factor among the governments of the world—I mean in world matters—and I look with apprehension upon a policy which may place the United States in a position where by force of environment or neighborship we can be made a compulsory participant in the struggles of the Old World nations over the balance of power in the Orient. Nor can I contemplate with equanimity, Mr. President, the adoption of any policy which may bring into perpetual competition with our people, with the men who raise tobacco on our farms, with the men who labor in our factories, the products of a labor which in the very nature of things must be cheaper than ours, because of radical and unchangeable differences, for climatic and other reasons, in the standard of living, and in the wage of labor.

But I can not elaborate, Mr. President. I have but imperfectly outlined some of the causes which lead me to dread and to fear the policy of territorial expansion. I may be wrong about it. I do not forget that some of the objections which have forced themselves upon me were urged by much abler men long ago, against the acquisition of every Territory which the Government of the United States has acquired, and the wisdom of the acquisition of which time has overwhelmingly vindicated. As the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER] not long ago said here, if we had not acquired Louisiana, we would, nearly a century ago, in all human probability have had a British sovereignty to the southward of us, controlling the Mississippi, as well as to the northward of us.

But I think I can see a valid distinction between the acquisition of territory contiguous to our own country, in our own climate, land to which we can march our troops, land into which we can build our railroads, land into which we can send our newspapers, land to which our people can emigrate and in which they can live and thrive, land easily reached by our public opinion, and territory and peoples of another race, alien to our associations and our blood, living under a tropical sky, and laboring under different conditions. I can not say, in view of the history of the country, that time may not change my views, but I must say that, as I now feel, if the ratification of this treaty involved permanent dominion by the United States over the archipelago and its people as a Territory of the United States, irrevocably committed us to the policy of territorial expansion, I could not give it my vote.

Mr. President, a few words more and I have done. Interruptions have impeded me. We are all anxious to do, I must assume, that thing which is for the best interest of our country. I have not been and am not able, with all the anxious thought which I have given to this subject, to see any safe resting place or middle ground between an absolute abandonment by the United States of the Philippine Archipelago and an acceptance of the cession made by this treaty. I am not able to forget that it is a treaty of peace, and that its ratification is to bring peace between the United States and the Kingdom of Spain. A rejection of it continues the status of war. Senators say that Spain is exhausted, and that active hostilities would not be renewed. Possibly this is true. Doubtless I am warranted in saying that probably this is true. Possibly it is not true. One can never safely prophesy what complications will come from a long-continued status of war. It is quite certain that we would be obliged to march out of Manila. We captured it (which shows our power there) in violation of an armistice.

The fact of the armistice and its terms it had been impossible to communicate to our officers and troops so far away. By the rules of war, therefore, they are relieved from responsibility for capturing the city of Manila in violation of its terms. But by the rules of war, based upon obvious justice, and essential to civilized warfare, as a nation we are in honor bound, if this treaty falls, to restore the status quo. International-law writers leave no doubt upon this proposition. We would be obliged to march our troops out of Manila, to release the 15,000, or thereabouts, Spanish prisoners captured there, to restore to them their arms, and permit them to again occupy the city which our forces captured. The treaty rejected, they are still our enemies. Would we then, still being at war with Spain, withdraw our forces under protection of Dewey's guns from the face of the enemy and sail away? To do so would be a novelty in war and a humiliation to our people.

If the status of war is to continue we could not well reduce our expenses to the basis of peace. We would be obliged, inevitably, to maintain our country and our expenditures upon the basis of war, and the cost would be great and in the end probably useless.

The situation, Mr. President, could not fail to be filled with unpleasant possibilities, indefinite public burdens, uncertainties, and trouble.

I have tried to consider the alternatives which confronted the President and the commissioners in concluding a treaty of peace. They could have made this treaty, of course, omitting all reference to the Philippines. Such a treaty would have left, in my view, the Philippine Archipelago and its people under the sovereignty and control of Spain. The President and commissioners could have done that. I do not hesitate to say here to-day such a treaty would have shocked the sense of justice and humanity of the American people. It is in the power of the Senate to so amend the treaty as to do that thing. Does any Senator propose to do it?

I have talked with a great many people upon the subject in Wisconsin. I have put to them this question: "Do we want the Philippine Archipelago?" Almost every one of them has said to me, "No; but do not give the islands back to Spain."

Mr. PETTIGREW. We could not if we wanted to.

Mr. SPOONER. Why?

Mr. PETTIGREW. Because the Filipinos would not allow it.

Mr. SPOONER. Let us examine that. I have said that I believe it to be true that it would shock the sentiment of our people if by this treaty of peace with Spain we left the people of the Philippine Archipelago subject to her tyranny. We could not very well go to war to liberate the people of Cuba, in the West, from the horrible tyranny of Spain, and, when that war for liberty ended by agreement, sail away and leave the people in the East under the tyranny of Spain. As an original proposition, we would not go there to liberate them, but we are there. We did not go to war in the interest of the Filipinos, it is true; but, Mr. President, duties come to men suddenly, without plan or expectation oftentimes.

If walking along the city street at night one comes across a sturdy brute beating a woman or a child into insensibility, a man would attack him, drag him away, disable him. Having done this, a man would not walk away and leave the woman or the child bleeding and helpless upon the street in the midnight to die, to freeze in the cold of winter, to starve, or perhaps again to be the subject of maltreatment. The same impulse which led one to defend would command to further protect.

Situations, Mr. President, create duties. This is as true of nations as it is of men.

It is true that some thousands of Filipinos aided in the capture of Manila. That is an element in this situation which can not be honorably disregarded. Whether they had done so or not, I believe it to be the general sentiment of our people, and I know of no one here who has proprosed anything against it, that we should not make a treaty which leaves that people subject forever to the loot and the lust and the brutality and the savagery which characterized the Government of Spain, under which they lived. So a treaty of that sort would not do.

No President would dare to make such a treaty, under the circumstances. The present President of the United States, an eminently humane man, who has fought for liberty, and who loves liberty, whose conduct in all this business has been upon a high plane, in the interest of humanity and in harmony with the dignity of such a Government and such a people, would not dare to make such a treaty. He has transferred in that respect the responsibility to the Senate. The Senate has power to so amend it.

This alternative being rejected, what next could be done? It has been asked here, Why did you not have Spain in this treaty relinquish the Philippines and leave the situation at that? I do not know what Spain might have been willing to do in that regard, but I doubt very much if she would have been willing to surrender her sovereignty over the Philippine Archipelago and her title of three hundred years upon our demand, disconnected with the claim of it as indemnity. I very much doubt if Spain would have listened to a contention upon our part that, as we went to war for the liberty of Cuba, we should close the war by a demand of her surrender of sovereignty in the Philippine Archipelago, all thought of indemnity being eliminated.

But it has been asked, Why did not the treaty deal with the Philippines as it does with Cuba? and my understanding is that if such were the form of the treaty it would be generally unobjectionable. What would have been in that event the situation? In my judgment it would have put the Government of the United States in an impossible situation. Let us analyze it for a moment. By this treaty Spain relinquishes her sovereignty over Cuba and her title to Cuba, with the statement, hardly an agreement, that we are to occupy the island, and an agreement that while we occupy it we shall discharge the duties imposed by international law upon a military occupant. Note that Spain relinquishes sovereignty and title not to any particular grantee.

The President and our commissioners would not accept the cession of Cuba to the United States, for obvious reasons. Upon our theory of government it must be true that the sovereignty and title thus relinquished by Spain vest in the people of Cuba. Certainly if they do not vest in the people of Cuba they remain in the kingdom of Spain. They can not be in nubibus. They must be somewhere. I assume that the title being abandoned by Spain, and the sovereignty relinquished by Spain, they are not relinquished to the world, but are relinquished to the people vitally interested in them. Suppose the same provision were incorporated in the treaty as to the Philippines.

What would be the situation? The Filipinos, except the individuals who aided us, have been our enemies in contemplation of law, because the subjects of a power with which we were at war, and the moment a treaty was signed and ratified, relinquishing the title and sovereignty to the Philippine Archipelago, that sovereignty and title, upon my contention, would vest, if it passed from Spain, in the people of the archipelago. That moment, ceasing to be the subjects of Spain, they would, of course, cease to be the enemies of the United States. In fact, the ratification of that treaty would bring peace between Spain and the United States, and, therefore, in law, peace with Spain and her subjects everywhere.

In this condition how would we obtain the right for one moment in law to do what our people feel should be done to save the Filipinos, to maintain order among them, to help them to establish a government, to protect them from anarchy among themselves and spoliation by other governments, and, in addition, what should not be forgotten, the right to take care in the long run the commercial and other interests of the United States in the archipelago? I can see in that event but one thing that we could rightfully do unless the people acquiesced in our plans, and that would be to withdraw our troops and sail away from the archipelago and leave that people abandoned. Leave them to anarchy. War is bad enough, God knows. It is pitiless enough, but, after all, it is conducted on rules based on justice and framed in the interest of civilization. Anarchy is unspeakably worse than war. Anarchy gives full play to all the passions and bloodthirstiness of men unrestrained by law. War is cruel and bitter, but anarchy is hell let loose upon the earth.

We do not yet know, nor does anyone yet know, I think, what we will deem it wise to do in the Philippine Archipelago. No one can well doubt that the purpose of the United States in accepting this cession is one of benevolence and good will to that people.

The Senator from South Dakota [Mr. PETTIGREW] said that if by the treaty we left these islands in the hands or under the control of Spain, Spain's sovereignty would be gone and that the Filipinos would be free from Spain. I doubt it. Spain, I think, would retake the Philippines. It must not be forgotten that Spain would no longer be concerned with Cuba. Care for that island would no longer exhaust her resources or diminish her power.

Spain would no longer be concerned in the care of Porto Rico. But that is not the end of the case. It must be remembered that we have sent back to Spain, at our own cost—and it was not only humane, but politic—125,000 men, with their arms. We would release, in addition, 15,000 prisoners at Manila and restore to them their arms. Can one well doubt that that proud nation—for it is a proud nation, and it is not only a proud nation, but it is a brave nation, a nation mourning over its loss of prestige—would send necessary reenforcements to the Philippine Islands, and, with the soldiers already there, retake and hold its cities and its sovereignty and bring that people again under subjection?

Senators say that to-day Spain is not financially able to do that. This I do not know. One can not very well say what a nation in stress is financially able to do. One can not know the hidden treasure which national pride would unlock and pour out. And, Mr. President, it is impossible certainly to say that none of the governments which have from the beginning of this transaction to the end of it sympathized with Spain, would furnish her money upon pledges growing out of her sovereignty over the Philippines adequate to capture and bring under dominion again the archipelago, moved, doubtless, to that end by the ulterior purpose of great commercial privileges, naval stations, and the like.

Desiring, Mr. President, to care, as a powerful nation ought to care in the circumstances, for the well-being of that people, wishing to treat them because we are there as we treat the people of Cuba, it has seemed to me that there is but one thing to do, and that is to accept the cession of the archipelago as provided in the treaty, and thereby to succeed to the title and sovereignty of Spain, and, having succeeded to that title and sovereignty, to go forward. Then, and only by that means, have we solid ground upon which to stand. By any other form of treaty, even dealing with the Philippines as the treaty deals with Cuba, we would have all of the embarrassments, all of the cost, all of the complications, all of the troubles, with a foundation of shifting sand upon which to stand.

Ah, Mr. President, we must retreat or go forward. There is no middle ground. We are at the parting of the ways in respect of the Philippines. We must go incontinently out of the archipelago, or succeed by a ratification of this treaty to the title and sovereignty of Spain, and with that as our foundation go forward to work out for that people what we will work out for the people of Cuba, and secure for ourselves as a Government such foothold there as will safeguard our interests and our trade in the Orient.

The Filipinos do not understand us to-day. It is not strange that they should be suspicious. They have never known good government. They have never lived under a government except one of brute force and violence and lust. I notice that all the rebellions among the tribes there have been justified rebellions. They seem to be a docile people. They have rebelled twice because of violation of the honor of their homes, of excessive and outrageous taxation, of oppression by the monks. They do not know us. They do not understand our purposes. They could not be expected to know how different are our sentiments, our aspirations, and civilization from those which have characterized the government they have known.

It is not wise either for them or for us that they should be given to understand that we have no right there, and I repeat, and this is the crucial point of my argument, that the only way in which we can rightfully secure a foothold there in order to accomplish anything—I speak not of permanent dominion in the archipelago—by accepting the cession contained in this treaty.

What is the difference between Cuba and the Philippines in this regard? Does it seem to Senators that there is none? To me it has seemed obvious and vast. Cuba, to begin with, is within a short distance of us. It is at our door. The Philippines are 7,000 miles away. A large number of Americans are interested in Cuba, and have been for many years. The Cuban people have dealt with our people during a long period. Many of them have been educated in our colleges and schools. Many of them have acquired their professions in the United States. Many of them became long ago citizens of the United States, and returned thence to their native land. They understand us and we understand them measurably. This is in no respect true as to the Filipinos.

The Cubans are within easy reach of our public opinion. They know what is published in our newspapers. They have studied our institutions. Not so with the Filipinos. Cuba, too, has not been the subject of possible foreign seizure. No nation has dared even to think, I believe, of obtaining a foothold upon the island of Cuba. No one would deny that it is absolutely within the sphere of American influence. This is not true as to the Philippine Archipelago. That archipelago has been the subject of intrigue upon the part of other governments, not governments either which from our standpoint govern very well, not governments which care much for the writ of habeas corpus, for religious liberty, or for the Declaration of Independence.

Mr. ALDRICH. Or the consent of the governed?

Mr. SPOONER. No, or the consent of the governed. They are Governments which rule with a strong and iron hand for their own purposes, and, Mr. President, we can not in honor leave the Philippine Archipelago and its people, all things considered, a derelict, abandoned in the Pacific seas to become the spoil of other nations.

There is another thing worth considering in respect to the difference between Cuba and her people and the archipelago and its people. As the Senator from Illinois [Mr. MASON], I think it was, said in his eloquent speech here the other day, it is a great and glorious thing for a nation or a people to win their own liberty and independence in war. But it is a far greater and more glorious thing for our nation to go into war in order to win liberty for another people.

We have sacrificed much, Mr. President, for Cuba. The graves of our boys in Cuba and here at home testify that. The sunken wreck in Havana Harbor, the coffin of our sailor lads, bears witness to that. We have poured out our treasure for Cuba. We have desolated our homes for Cuba. All this in achieving the object of the war. The Cubans know this, understand this, and I hope appreciate this. There is no such relation to the Filipinos. Our advent there was an incident to war for the liberty of Cuba. But I repeat, we are there. What is more, Mr. President, we completely occupy Cuba by our forces. We do not under the protocol probably completely occupy the Philippine Islands.

If I may be permitted to repeat, if we take this title we are there as a sovereign. We have the will and the power to enforce law. We will enforce order there. We will establish government there. We will not violate the Declaration of Independence. This treaty will be an emancipation proclamation to the Filipinos, securing in that island all of the great rights which we so prize, and which have been here so much discussed. That we will give them every possible opportunity for self-government I do not allow myself to doubt. I hope the day may soon come when they may have a government of their own. But we can create that, Mr. President, in no way except by the ratification of this treaty.

It must not be forgotten either that if we stay there under a treaty containing the provision as to the Philippines which this one contains as to Cuba, notwithstanding all of the differences to which I have alluded between the two situations, spend our money there, lose our men there by casualty and disease, religiously watch and nourish the interests of that people, and develop their power of self-government until under our auspices they have erected a government which under the principles of international law we can recognize as independent, we are without power to protect our own interests there, unless that government after it is recognized shall consent. We could not obtain a coaling station there if that government declined. Through foreign intrigue it might decline. We would be powerless, except by the strong hand of force, to reimburse ourselves within fair and just limits the outlay and trouble and sacrifice which we shall have endured for their sake.

There is another thing about it, Mr. President. Under this treaty we can give them, when the time comes, the sovereignty and title of Spain. They will have then the possessory right and the title, because, this treaty being ratified, we will possess it; we will have it to cede. We may cede it upon conditions such as at the time shall seem to us best for them and best for us. We may cede it upon condition that their constitution shall contain irrevocable guaranties essential to freedom, to popular education, to religious liberty, to the right of habeas corpus, the protection of life and property; indeed all the guaranties which American communities under the Declaration of Independence demand. We can cede it upon condition of the grant to us of adequate naval stations, supply stations, and commercial advantages. And if we have doubt as to the permanent stability and power of their government to stand alone, if we then feel we can not safely sail away and leave them to their destiny, we can, in their interest as well as in ours, maintain a protectorate over them with comparative safety, because we can make it a condition of cession of this title and sovereignty to such government as they shall establish that they shall enter into no treaty obligation with other governments without our consent. Without this power we can with safety maintain no protectorate of a government 7,000 miles away, over whose treaty-making power and over whose international transactions we have no control.

Again, Mr. President, the whole matter will be within our own hands. If we find we can not get on with the Filipinos; if, after studying the conditions over there, our people find we can not without strife and intolerable burdens do them any good, we can then cede the sovereignty to them and sail away. We will not be then running away from a responsibility at first sight. We will not subject ourselves to possibly the just charge of cowardice by other nations. We will have left them then after having made every honest effort in our power, upon the solid foundation of Spain's sovereignty and title, to help them to benefits which they would not have. We will have attempted to shower upon them blessings which long-continued tyranny has deprived them of the power to appreciate.

No; there is no middle ground. The treaty should be ratified, and ratified promptly. But, Mr. President, an acceptance of this cession does not determine at all, in my view, the future policy of the United States as to the Philippines. I am not in favor of the resolution of the Senator from Georgia, not because I differ from the sentiment expressed in the last one, but I am not in favor of tying the hands of this Government as to the future. It is our business to make laws, not to fulminate policies.

If this territory be acquired and its sovereignty becomes ours, it is for the people of the United States to say what shall be done with it; and without regard to the merits of the declarations contained in his resolutions, I am convinced, in view of the entire situation, the distance of the islands, the unfamiliarity of their people with us, their suspicion of all comers, that if this resolution or any other of the kind is passed it will be fruitless of anything of use, and fruitful only of mischief, friction, and trouble hereafter.

Let us ratify this treaty and bring peace to the country. Let us take this sovereignty and title, and then do with it what is right, leaving to the people to determine hereafter what the permanent policy of this Government with reference to it is to be.

Mr. President, I believe in the people. It seems something of demagogy for one dependent for his position upon the people to say that in a public way, but I believe in the people. Sometimes at the first they are wrong; sometimes they are unfair in their judgment of measures and unjust in their judgment of men. Sometimes they give ear to the demagogue, and sometimes for the hour the popular judgment is overturned by some clamor or some prejudice, but the sober second thought of the American people, the judgment at which they arrive at last, is likely to be quite infallible. Anyhow, we are their servants and they are our masters.

The irrevocable policy of the American people is to be determined by the American people, not by their uninstructed temporary servants. When they have had time to consider this subject, not when the flags are fluttering and the bands are playing and the troops are marching, but in the calm of their firesides, in the light of debate upon the rostrum, they will render a judgment which must be controlling. If it comports with ours, it will be for those of us who are still here to carry it out. If it does not comport with ours, it will be for those of us who are still here, in my judgment, just the same to carry it out, or to quit and allow them to send agents here who will do their will.

One who is not willing, Mr. President, to rely upon the sober second thought of our people upon this question, and all questions, impeaches the success of republican government. I have no fear that the people who went to war to give liberty to Cuba will in the end arrive at a conclusion which will oppress the Filipinos, or which will violate the Declaration of Independence in the Philippine Archipelago. The ideals upon which this Government is founded are the ideals of the American people. We have not the power to commit them to an unchangeable policy. We have neither right nor reason to doubt that their conclusion will religiously maintain the best ideals of the Republic, and will be in harmony with justice, generosity, and the highest civilization.

Mr. TILLMAN. Mr. President, I rise to a question of personal privilege.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. CARTER in the chair). The Senator from South Carolina will state his question of personal privilege.

Mr. TILLMAN. Under the consent agreement reached by the Senate in regard to the discussion of the treaty it was decided that any Senator who wished to discuss it for the RECORD or for the public should do so before 2 o'clock, with the privilege, if he had not completed his remarks when 2 o'clock arrived, that he should have the right to go on and finish. The Senator from Wisconsin knew this perfectly well, and while I realize and understand that he was anxious not to trespass upon the time of the Senate, and while he has said as an excuse that he was unwell, I submit that the interruption which I made was pertinent and applicable to the discussion which he was making, and my only object was to prevent misstatements, which I know he was making inadvertently, going to the country under the sanction of the one Senator here who perhaps has as much influence as any other man in this body.

In his anxiety to hurry on he saw proper to use discourteous language to me which he has withdrawn, and I therefore have nothing to say on that point. I know the Senator too well and respect him too highly, and indeed love him in a sense, to feel that he would knowingly or willingly wound the feelings of any of his colleagues.

Mr. SPOONER. If the Senator will permit me, of course I would not wound the Senator's feelings, and I made as prompt and courteous a response——

Mr. TILLMAN. I understand that, and I have not the slightest malice toward the Senator, and his words have left no sting. I am simply doing outside of the limitation what the Senator would not permit me to do at a time so it could go in the body of his speech, and that is to put before the people in the same RECORD which will carry the Senator's speech to the country some statements which will contradict what he has said.

Mr. SPOONER. I am perfectly willing that it shall go into my speech as coming from the Senator. My only——

Mr. TILLMAN. If the Senator will allow these statements to go in the body of his speech at the point where I tried to get them in——

Mr. SPOONER. Certainly.

Mr. TILLMAN. I will be satisfied. The only point with me is that I want to read them right now.

Mr. SPOONER. That is all right.

Mr. TILLMAN. They are very brief and will consume only a minute or two.

Under date of Manila, Philippine Islands, August 29, there appears in this document which accompanied the treaty when sent to us by the President a letter headed "Office of Military Information," and signed by Maj. J. F. Bell, of the Engineer Corps. Major Bell had been in Manila as an agent of this Government, seeking information in regard to the condition there, and under instruction from General Merritt had proceeded in a great many directions in the island of Luzon under safe conduct from Aguinaldo. He speaks of Aguinaldo. The Senator from Wisconsin called me "the Senator from Aguinaldo," and it seems that in one sense I am his representative here, as I am simply trying to prevent him from being misrepresented. Major Bell says that Aguinaldo is—

> Honest, sincere, and poor; not well educated, but a natural leader of men, with considerable shrewdness and ability; has the power of creating among the people confidence in himself, and is undoubtedly a very popular man, highly respected by all.

In another part of the same letter he says:

> Aguinaldo has in Hongkong about $300,000 and in Bakor about $220,000 of public funds.

I presume this money was that which he had received from the Spanish Government, and which he held in trust. He goes on:

> He has commissioned an agent to purchase all the nitrate of soda to be found in Manila and a lot more in China and Japan. He has a cartridge factory at Imus capable of working 400 people. He proposes soon to move his headquarters to Malolos, on the railroad north of Manila and only about thirty minutes' ride from the city.

Now, here is what I wish to direct the attention of the Senator from Wisconsin to, if he will do me the honor to listen, and it is the one essential fact which seems to be ignored and forgotten here by those Senators in this body who propose to ratify the treaty and let the consequences follow. Major Bell says:

> There is not a particle of doubt but what Aguinaldo and his leaders will resist any attempt of any government to reorganize a colonial government here. They are especially bitter toward the Spaniards, but equally determined not to submit any longer to being a colony of any other government. What they would like best of all would be a Filipino republic with an American protectorate, for none realize their inability more clearly than they to maintain a republic without protection of some stronger power.

In the same letter appears a statement as to the condition of preparation in which those people are for war. The statement is made that they have 40,000 stands of arms. Now, we know this man is an ambitious man, imbued, no doubt, with great and fervid patriotism and also with great self-esteem. He is there with that army of 30,000 or 40,000 men, armed and ready to resist, and his agent in this capital has notified you that he will not submit to being bought and sold, or to his people being bought and sold, like slaves or cattle.

Mr. HOAR. I should like to ask the Senator from South Carolina a question.

Mr. TILLMAN. I shall be glad to answer it, sir, if I can.

Mr. HOAR. Does not Aguinaldo at this moment hold in peace and order fifty times as much of the territory of the Philippine Islands as we do?

Mr. TILLMAN. According to the best information that I can get, sir, he holds the entire Philippine archipelago except a small territory around Cavite and the city of Manila.

All I desire at this time, Mr. President—for I could not under the circumstances attempt, if I were able or willing to undertake it, to answer the able and eloquent sophistries of my friend from Wisconsin—will be to say that coming, not as a "Senator from Aguinaldo," but as a Senator from Africa, if you please, South Carolina, with 750,000 colored population and only 500,000 whites, I realize what you are doing, while you do not; and I would save this country from the injection into it of another race question which can only breed bloodshed and a costly war and the loss of the lives of our brave soldiers. I would save the country the disgrace of having our flag float over a battlefield drenched with the blood of patriots fighting for liberty and self-government shed by American soldiers.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

THURSDAY, February 2, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of the proceedings of yesterday was read and approved.

JULIUS A. KAISER.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 1579) for the relief of Julius A. Kaiser.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States be, and he is hereby, authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint Julius A. Kaiser upon the retired list of the Navy, in the grade of passed assistant engineer, as of the date he was entitled by law or navy regulations to examination for promotion from assistant engineer to said grade.

Mr. BAILEY. This is a bill to retire a man who is not now in the service, is it?

Mr. BUTLER. Will the gentleman withhold his statement until he hears the statement of facts?

Mr. BAILEY. Reserving the right to object, I will. The first question, however, I wish to ask is, Is this a proposition to retire a man not now in the service?

Mr. BUTLER. No; he is now on the retired list.

Mr. BAILEY. And this is a proposition to promote him?

Mr. BUTLER. It is.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I object.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. Will the gentleman waive his objection until he hears a statement of facts?

Mr. BAILEY. Out of courtesy to gentlemen I will, but nothing you can say will change my opinion.

Mr. LOUDENSLAGER. The man was in the Asiatic Squadron, and was injured, and was unable to be examined.

Mr. BAILEY. Then give him a pension. If he was injured in the service I am willing to give him a pension.

Mr. BUTLER. Do I understand that no facts that can be stated will induce the gentleman from Texas to change his objection?

Mr. BAILEY. Absolutely none to promote a retired officer.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

CITY OF ALBUQUERQUE, N. MEX.

Mr. FERGUSSON. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the consideration of the bill (H. R. 8694) to enable the city of Albuquerque, N. Mex., to create certain indebtedness, and for other purposes.

The Clerk proceeded with the reading of the bill.

Mr. BUTLER. Mr. Speaker, I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

SAMUEL RACEY.

Mr. CLARK of Iowa. I ask unanimous consent that the bill (H. R. 6718) for the relief of Samuel Racey be taken from the Speaker's table in order that the amendments of the Senate may be concurred in.

There being no objection, the Senate amendments were read, and concurred in.

WIDENING OF NINETEENTH STREET NORTHWEST, DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

The SPEAKER laid before the House the amendment of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11605) for the widening of Nineteenth street NW.

The amendment of the Senate was read, as follows:

After the word "highway," in line 9, page 3, insert—

"When the use of a part only of any piece or parcel of ground shall be condemned, the jury, in determining its value, shall not take into consideration any benefits that may accrue to the remainder thereof from the opening of said avenue, but such benefits shall be considered in determining what assessment shall be made on or against that part of such lot as is not taken, as is hereinbefore provided."

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I move that the House nonconcur in the amendment of the Senate and ask a conference.

Mr. DOCKERY. Pending that motion, will the gentleman allow an inquiry? What is the essential change made by the Senate amendment?

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. My colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. RICHARDSON], can, I presume, explain the matter better than I can.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I have not had time to examine this amendment. I am in favor of nonconcurring in it, in order that it may be examined. It appears to be a very material amendment, and I am not willing it should be concurred in until it has been at least examined.

Mr. DOCKERY. Nor am I willing it should be concurred in without examination or explanation. It occurs to me that the committee should examine it before asking the House to nonconcur, because we know it frequently happens that when bills go into conference differences are compromised, and when the question comes back to the House we have to vote on the conference report as a whole. I hope the committee will at least do the House the honor of examining the Senate amendment before asking us to take any action upon it. It seems to me that it is a change of the whole theory of assessing damages in such cases.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will ask to have the Senate amendment read again, if there be no objection. I did not distinctly catch its purport on the first reading.

The amendment was again read.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, that amendment, it seems to me, involves a very radical departure, and I hope the committee will at least give the House the benefit of their judgment before asking us to nonconcur.

Mr. RICHARDSON. So far as I am concerned, I will not interpose any objection to that request.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask unanimous consent that the matter lie on the Speaker's table for the present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It can go to the committee, if the gentleman prefers it.

Mr. DOCKERY. No; I do not ask that. Let it lie on the Speaker's table until the committee can examine it.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. There is no objection to that whatever.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the bill and amendment will lie on the Speaker's table.

VENEZUELAN CADET AT WEST POINT.

The SPEAKER also laid before the House the amendments of the Senate to the joint resolution (H. Res. 344) granting authority to the Republic of Venezuela to send a cadet to the West Point Military Academy.

The amendments were read, and concurred in.

GEN. JOHN R. BROOKE.

Mr. SHAFROTH. I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 7860) to amend an act entitled "An act for the relief of Brig. Gen. John R. Brooke, United States Army," approved March 30, 1894.

The bill was read, as follows:

Whereas the legal representatives of John Smith failed to accept the provisions of an act entitled "An act for the relief of Brig. Gen. John R. Brooke, United States Army," approved March 30, 1894, within three months from the passage thereof, for the reason that neither the legal representatives nor the heirs of said John Smith had notice or knowledge of the passage of said act, and were first informed thereof during the month of February, 1897: Therefore,

Be it enacted, etc., That an act entitled "An act for the relief of Brig. Gen. John R. Brooke, United States Army," approved March 30, 1894, be, and the same is hereby, amended to read as follows:

"That the Secretary of the Treasury of the United States be authorized and directed to pay to the legal representatives of John Smith, late of New Mexico, the sum of $1,000, being in full satisfaction of the judgment obtained by said John Smith in the district court of the First judicial district of the Territory of New Mexico, at the August term, 1869, against Lieut. Col. John R. Brooke, Third Infantry, United States Army, now brigadier-general, United States Army, for alleged trespass and false imprisonment: Provided, That the provisions of this act shall be accepted by the legal representatives of said John Smith as a settlement in full of all claims against John R. Brooke, of the United States Army, within three months from the passage thereof. And the said sum of $1,000 is hereby appropriated for said purpose, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, to be paid and received in full discharge and satisfaction of all claims arising out of said judgment."

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a brief statement concerning the facts connected with this bill.

In 1869 Major-General Brooke, who is now in Cuba, was a lieutenant-colonel, located in New Mexico. While there he ordered the arrest of two persons, citizens of that Territory, for violation of the rules of the Army concerning the selling of liquor. Those persons were arrested and placed in the guardhouse, but were afterwards released without any prosecution having been had against them. They each sued General Brooke for $10,000 damages for false imprisonment. He turned the matter over to the War Department that it might conduct his defense.

An appearance was made in the case and a demurrer filed. But afterwards the attorney for the United States died, and the result was that when the case was called for trial no one appeared in behalf of the Government, and a judgment was taken against General Brooke for $10,000 damages in favor of each of the plaintiffs. Those judgments have been in force in the Territory of New Mexico; but General Brooke has not been stationed there since. In 1894 Congress passed a bill relieving General Brooke from those two judgments. One of the parties drew the money under the bill for the relief of General Brooke, granting to each of them $1,000. But the other of the plaintiffs had died in the meantime, and his heirs did not know of the passage of the act of Congress, which limited the time within which the parties could draw the money from the Government to three months.

Some time after the three months' limitation had expired they applied for the money, but the War Department held that this limit fixed by the law having expired, they were not entitled to the money unless Congress should see proper to extend the time.

This bill simply extends the time so that the heirs of John Smith may be enabled to claim the $1,000 within three months from the passage of this act and satisfy the judgment against Lieutenant-Colonel Brooke.

This, Mr. Speaker, is identically the same bill as that passed in 1894, except that its provisions are limited to the heirs of John Smith. But, as I have already stated, it failed as to John Smith because of the fact that the claimant did not know of the existence of the act or of the limit fixed in the law, and did not make application for the money in time.

I might state in this connection that General Brooke is anxious that the judgment should be wiped out. He feels that it might be presented against his estate and embarrass the settlement of the same after his death.

Mr. HOPKINS. Let me ask the gentleman what there is in this proceeding to wipe out a judgment in a matter of this kind in New Mexico?

Mr. SHAFROTH. This bill authorizes the payment of $1,000 in satisfaction of the judgment, and unless the judgment is satisfied the money can not be paid.

Mr. HOPKINS. So that these parties would be required to satisfy the judgment against the estate and settle the matter in that way?

Mr. SHAFROTH. Yes; precisely.

And the judgment, let me say, in behalf of Andrew Cameron, the other party who was arrested, has been already satisfied by the acceptance of the same amount from the Government by Cameron.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Speaker, this is a bill for the settlement of a suit against an officer of the Government who is not at all to blame and should not be held responsible for the claim. He was ordered away before the matter was determined, and had no opportunity of making the defense that he could have made.

A civil suit was brought against him and nobody appeared for him, and judgment was therefore rendered by default. It never should have been rendered and could not and ought not to be collected. But it stands against him and against his estate, and the object of this bill is to wipe out this judgment and free the estate from the claim.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is correct; that is the case as it stands now.

Mr. HULL (continuing). And the heirs are willing to take the thousand dollars and satisfy the judgment. I think the act should be passed by Congress.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Mr. Speaker, since the introduction of the bill General Brooke has been promoted from brigadier-general to a major-general, and an amendment ought to be made, so that the bill may be made to conform to his present rank.

Mr. BAILEY. I suggest, if the gentleman will allow me, that if the rank of General Brooke appears in the papers at all he will appear as brigadier-general, and perhaps it is better to let the bill conform to the judgment.

Mr. HOPKINS. The bill recites the fact that General Brooke was a lieutenant-colonel at the time the judgment was entered against him, and being only a colonel at the time the judgment was rendered, the bill should conform to the facts as they then existed.

Mr. SHAFROTH. That is correct. The fact that he was a lieutenant-colonel at the time the judgment was rendered is recited in the bill.

Mr. HOPKINS. And the subsequent promotion would not affect the judgment.

Mr. SHAFROTH. Not at all; and the only purpose of the amendment is to make the bill conform to his present rank.

The SPEAKER. The amendment proposed by the gentleman will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 2, line 9, before the word "general" strike out the word "brigadier" and insert the word "major."

The amendment was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. SHAFROTH, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ST. LOUIS, OKLAHOMA AND SOUTHERN RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. CURTIS of Kansas. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 4070) to amend an act granting to the St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the act granting to the St. Louis, Oklahoma and Southern Railway Company a right of way through the Indian Territory and Oklahoma Territory, and for other purposes, which took effect on March 28, 1890, be, and the same is hereby, amended as follows:

"The time for completing the survey of the entire line of said road and filing a map of the same with the Secretary of the Interior and constructing the first 50 miles, and the completion of the remaining sections thereof, shall be, and is hereby, extended two years from the dates specified in said act."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There being no objection, the bill was considered, and was ordered to a third reading; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. CURTIS of Kansas, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union for the further consideration of the river and harbor appropriation bill.

The motion was agreed to.

The House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, Mr. HOPKINS in the chair.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Upper White River, Arkansas: For the construction of Lock and Dam No. 1, on Upper White River, above Batesville, according to the project, plans, and specifications reported and recommended by Capt. William L. Sibert, in House Document No. 73, Fifty-fourth Congress, second session, to complete said lock and dam, $160,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, there is an amendment to that section of the bill, which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend on page 54, in line 5, after the word "river," by striking out the word "above" and inserting the words "at or near."

Mr. BURTON. I am informed that there is some little question as to the exact limits of the town of Batesville, and that the amendment will make the provision more specific.

The amendment was considered, and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving French Broad and Little Pigeon rivers, Tennessee: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. GIBSON. In line 14, page 55, I move to strike out the word "five" and insert in lieu thereof the word "ten;" so that $10,000 may be appropriated to the improvement of the French Broad and Little Pigeon, instead of $5,000.

In support of my motion, I wish to state that $10,000 is the amount recommended by the War Department as the sum that can profitably be expended in the year for which the bill makes appropriation.

This river, the French Broad, in connection with the Little Pigeon, is one of the most important rivers in the State of Tennessee for its length. It runs through a section of country that has no railroad, but is extremely fertile.

According to the report of the Engineer Department, the value of the freight on that river in the year 1897, carried on steamboats and barges, was $617,255.80, and I think that the amount now carried on that river in a year aggregates over a million dollars in value. There are a few shoals that need deepening. The Government has gone to the expense of providing a plant, a steamboat with dredges and barges, and men who are specially fitted to do this work. The Engineer Department has recommended the sum of $10,000 for the further improvement of this river. This improvement is of very great value to my people, and I hope that the committee will agree with me in increasing this amount from $5,000 to $10,000, and thus enable my people to have a river that can be navigated by steamboats all the year round.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, this is of a piece with all the requests that we have had. The committee pay close attention to the recommendations of the War Department in these appropriations, but we have more to do than merely to act as clerks and write down in the bill what they recommended. We had to take into account all the projects, aggregating $15,580,000 for the next year, and numerous others besides. It was necessary to make a cut on an average of about one-third, and in some cases a little more. I take it this river, the French Broad, is now on the map, and after the remarks of the gentleman from Tennessee about it, that it will receive consideration in the future and be properly cared for. I have no doubt it is important, but there is nothing exceptional in this case at all.

The amendment of Mr. GIBSON was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Tennessee River between Chattanooga and Riverton, $35,000; of which amount so much as may be necessary shall be applied in the survey of that portion between Bridgeport and Decatur and a resurvey of the remaining portions of said river between the points named: Provided, That so much as may be necessary may be used for a survey of the Clinch and French Broad rivers.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, in pursuance of the notice of amendments to this section, I desire to offer two amendments, the first of which I send to the Clerk's desk to be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 22, page 55, after the word "named," the following: "And in making plans and estimates for the construction of locks and dams and other work between Chattanooga and Shellmound to make navigation easy and safe through that portion of the river commonly called 'the Suck,' or mountain section;' also estimates of the cost of the construction of a canal across Moccasin Bend, below Chattanooga, if in the opinion of the engineers such canal be deemed necessary."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, this is merely a direction to the engineer force, which the corps desired to have come from Congress, for the preparation of the plan and the making of estimates. I deem it to be unnecessary for me to discuss the necessity of the same since the Committee on Rivers and Harbors have agreed, with a slight amendment, to adopt this as the amendment of the committee or offer a similar amendment as a substitute.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, the phraseology of that amendment does not seem exactly in accordance with that used in other portions of the bill, and I have a substitute which I think the gentleman from Tennessee will find to fully satisfy his wish in that matter. I take it the Corps of Engineers, in making the survey, would at any rate make the investigation called for, but I see no objection to giving specific direction that they may do so. I send the committee substitute to the Clerk's desk.

Insert, in line 22, page 55, after the word "named," the following:

"And in making the survey between Chattanooga and Shellmounds, through that portion of the river commonly called the 'Suck,' an examination shall be made with a view to the construction of locks and dams suitable for convenient and safe navigation. Also, if on examination it shall be thought desirable, an estimate shall be made of the cost of constructing a canal across Moccasin Bend, below Chattanooga."

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, the substitute covers the whole question, and is entirely satisfactory to us.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman withdraw his amendment?

Mr. MOON. I withdraw the amendment and ask for the passage of the substitute.

The amendment of Mr. BURTON was agreed to.

Mr. MOON. Now, Mr. Chairman, I offer as an amendment to this section as amended the following:

Strike out the word "thirty-five," in line 18, and insert "one hundred;" so that it will read, "one hundred thousand dollars."

The amendment was read by the Clerk.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I regret that I have not on this amendment the hearty approval and consent of the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. There is but little that I desire to add to the remarks made in the few moments I had in the general debate upon this particular subject. The necessity for the increase is altogether apparent from the correspondence between the committee and the Engineer Corps.

It will be remembered that the committee, in making their estimates for the improvement of the Tennessee River, followed as far as possible the direction of the engineers. It is true they did not give the amount requested by the engineers, but they cut down the appropriations on each of the subdivisions of the river improvements in proportion; that is, that part of the river between Knoxville and Chattanooga the estimate of the engineer was reduced to meet the necessities of the Government; the committee not being willing to appropriate the full amount for that section, the engineer expressed a willingness to submit to the amount indicated by the committee.

Between Riverton and the mouth of the river the appropriation was not what the engineer desired. The committee, in the spirit of economy, cut it down in proportion to the other appropriations. The engineers thought that just. The committee declined to give any appropriation for the shoals, in view of the statement of the engineers. No complaint was made of that. But they appropriate only $35,000 for surveys and improvement of the river between Chattanooga and Riverton, a distance of 226 miles. Now, the improvements there needed would cost $3,000,000. It is perfectly apparent, then, that this appropriation was intended merely to keep the work moving, not to effect any permanent good in that section by way of improvements.

Now, why should the engineers' advice not be taken in that section of the river and be taken on the other portion of the river? The engineers inform us that the Government has upon this section and work a plant, machinery, forces of men, and an engineer corps all collected that it is absolutely necessary to keep together, and that the appropriation of $35,000 is not sufficient to protect the Government property or the interest of the work already begun in that section. They ask $300,000 for this purpose. The use of $100,000 is absolutely necessary to protect the Government interests and not lose the benefit in part of what has been done, and so as not to scatter the force and cause a destruction of the machinery belonging to the Government.

Not having made a full appropriation—the increase to $100,000—the item of $35,000 is necessary and recommended by the engineer force. For protecting the work already done, keeping together the force, and protecting the public interests this increase is desired. The committee in considering this question refused the appropriation between the points mentioned because of the statement that new plans and specifications were necessary at the shoals. We are asking nothing for the shoals. We concur that if a million dollars could be saved at that point, it ought to be done, by delay and new plans; but the committee reached the conclusion from this statement of the engineer that it was necessary to keep the work going between Riverton and Chattanooga, which conclusion was clearly erroneous. The correspondence with the engineer subsequent to that misconstruction of his position by the committee is before the House. I hope that the chairman of the committee and the House, for the purpose of protecting the public interests in that section, will vote for the amendment.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I would not occupy the attention of the committee but for the fact that during the confusion, which has been so great, the gentleman from Tennessee was not heard on this side of the House. This is a matter with which I am somewhat familiar. It will be remembered that in the course of general debate it was explained by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] that the committee had refused an appropriation for the improvement of Colbert Shoals on the Tennessee River, because of a suggestion from the engineer that he could improve the plans so as to make a great saving. I have in my hand a letter of the engineer, in which he says, very briefly, he very much regrets that he made that suggestion, because he says that even $250,000 would have been appropriately and economically expended on that work during the current year even though the change in plan should have been made.

Now, the fact about it is that we have expended a vast amount of money on the Tennessee River, and not a dollar too much. It is a mighty channel of commerce with its enormous tributaries, and the country at large scarcely understands the value and importance of that river. Contracts could be made to-day for the transportation of iron from the Tennessee River to the markets of Europe, where it is now going in large quantities, for 75 cents a ton cheaper than it is now being transported if the work on the Tennessee River was completed. Well, in its wisdom—and I do not combat the propriety of it—the committee have declined to prosecute that work, although we took out one enormous shoal, Muscle Shoals, leaving a block of obstruction in the river and rendering the work on which we have spent so much money comparatively valueless.

Now, here is an appropriation of $35,000 only which is to be used from Chattanooga to Riverton; and then such an amount out of that $35,000 as may be necessary to make new surveys between Bridgeport and Decatur; and then a provision that so much as necessary may be used for the survey of Clinch and French Broad rivers. Now, by the time these surveys are made I do not suppose that any man will hope that there would be one dollar left for the general purpose of repairs to the present works, which are very valuable, and for the prosecution of the same. Therefore, it seems to me, although I do not like to support an amendment to this bill, that the $35,000 is totally inadequate for the purpose intended.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I could not hear, unfortunately, all that was said by the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON], but I take it that he desires that the $35,000 should be raised to $100,000 in order to keep the skilled force at work. In other words, the Government should appropriate $100,000 to keep a set of laborers going and keep them at work until we decide what to do. Now, this is the situation. The amount required for the completion of the proposed improvement there is $5,362,939, as estimated. The engineer in charge came before the committee and stated that he was satisfied it would cost some $1,130,000 more than that, making $6,500,000 for the improvement. But he also stated that at one place he thought a change could be made from parallel locks and dams to two dams in the river, which would save a million or more. I say, Mr. Chairman, it would be criminal extravagance for this House to make an appropriation looking toward the completion of that improvement costing $6,500,000 until we know more about it.

Mr. MOON. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. MOON. I regret, Mr. Chairman, that the gentleman was unable to hear fully what I had to say. I fully agree with the committee in their position not to appropriate now a million of dollars. The only point I make for the amendment is this: The committee has followed the advice of the engineers on other divisions of the river, and has made this report upon it. Now, the engineer says that the appropriation of $35,000 for this division of the river is not sufficient to protect the public property and interests there. The increase in the appropriation is not intended to benefit the river so much by the continuance of the improvement, for that will take a million dollars or more, as to protect work done and public property. I call the gentleman's attention to this section of a letter which the committee received from the engineer. I will read the whole section if the gentleman will give me the time.

Mr. BURTON. I will; but perhaps I shall desire some extension of time.

Mr. MOON. I will read it.

We do not need any time and we do not need any money for making a survey at Colbert Shoals. We can go forward with the old improvement if Congress thinks best to adhere to it, or we can change to the new plan and proceed with the work as soon as the money is available.

If Congress should see fit to authorize the Secretary of War to continue the improvement by a lateral canal or by locks and dams, whichever plan was the most economical and best, then the matter would have ample consideration and no time need be lost; but if Congress thinks that it is necessary to suspend judgment upon the matter for a year, we might still expend at least $100,000 most economically and advantageously in quarrying, cutting, and preparing the stone which will be needed in either case for the construction of the lock. This will enable us to take care of the expensive machinery and other plant which we have assembled for this work and to hold together our skilled force of engineers, mechanics, and laborers, which we have collected after much trouble and expense and which will be scattered and lost if we are unable to give them any employment for a year.

Now, it was upon that statement of the engineer that we insist that the committee has been in error and hope it will put itself right.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I want to say that the committee fully understood that situation and considered it carefully, and regarded $85,000 or $100,000 too high a price for keeping together the skilled mechanics and other workmen in anticipation of something we may do in the future. To do so would be a virtual committal of the Government to the expenditure of $6,500,000 when we are uncertain where we shall land, and I think the House ought to support the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in this position.

Now, in regard to my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR], he is in error in regard to there being no provision for the maintenance of these canals. These come under the act of 1884 and are provided for without appropriation. At the Muscle Shoals the locks and canals carried 5,119 tons of freight last year, worth $88,000, and it cost the Government $68,000, paid out of the Treasury under the act of 1884, to maintain these public works and keep them in repair. I do not think it can be said that we have not been generous to this section of the Tennessee River. I want to call attention to the fact that the appropriation in 1896 was only $50,000 for the river from Chattanooga to the mouth, and this year we are appropriating $135,000.

Mr. MOON. May I ask the gentleman if the fact that the Fifty-fourth Congress did a great error and injustice to the people of that section authorizes this Congress to pursue that course?

Mr. BURTON. Of course that does not govern our action, but I wish to say, and I think the House will understand it, that the Fifty-fourth Congress had a much clearer way in making appropriations for rivers and harbors, for we have thirty millions of deferred contracts on continuing-contract work which must hereafter be appropriated for. They could be much more generous; and when we equal their appropriations for this work, I think we have done our full duty. The substance of the whole matter is, here is an improvement proposed at an enormous expense, and we can not afford to go ahead and commit ourselves to it until we know more of the situation. As I stated yesterday, surveys have been made under the supervision of three different officers, and we do not know where we are. We want one plan perfected by one engineer.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I will not go any further with the main argument of the proposition, but I will point out to the gentleman from Ohio, the chairman of the committee [Mr. BURTON], why it is that the Tennessee River has borne so small a proportion of traffic. I read from the official report of the engineer. He states:

The question of completing the Colbert Shoals Canal is one of money only, and Major Kingman in his official report states that the work can be done in two years or less time if the money required is forthcoming. The immense work which the Government has done on the Tennessee River at a cost of some $5,000,000 is of no practical value until the work on the Colbert Shoals is completed. The Tennessee River improvement is a question of greater importance than any other river and harbor work, except that of the Mississippi and Ohio. The bed of the Tennessee River is composed of rock and other hard substance, so as to be free from drifting sand bars.

All the work is firm and lasting, which is not the case with many of the other rivers upon which large expenditures have been and are being made. At the Muscle Shoals, some 25 miles above Colbert Shoals, the river falls 85 feet in a distance of 16 miles. This is passed by one canal of two locks and another of nine locks. This work is already complete, but is of no use unless the work below is also completed, so that boats can pass the obstruction known as Colbert Shoals. One lock is already complete at the Colbert Shoals at a cost of about one-half million dollars, but is thoroughly useless without the other work contemplated by the appropriation asked for. It is just like cutting a tunnel and when almost done to stop the work and let it drag along when the proper expenditure of a sum less than the interest on what has already been expended would finish the tunnel and make the entire work available.

Unless an appropriation is made this session the work will practically be suspended for a year, and the legal interest at 8 per cent upon the money already expended upon this work would be $595,161. Therefore, to make this appropriation would cost the Government nothing; it would really save the Government, because in addition to saving interest we would save the loss and deterioration caused by delay.

That is the sort of river and harbor work we are having. The engineers go to work and improve Muscle Shoals at a cost of $5,000,000. Now they can not get over Muscle Shoals from below without crossing Colbert Shoals. So they spend half a million dollars on Colbert Shoals and then leave the work to wash away and say they are waiting for some new plan.

Mr. BURTON. Is the gentleman in favor of going ahead with a project on which we are asked to expend six and a half million dollars when there is no sufficient survey and an uncertainty amounting to a million dollars as to the cost, besides an uncertainty as to the best plan to be pursued?

Mr. GROSVENOR. I will answer the gentleman.

Mr. BURTON. Let me say that all those letters have been before our committee and have been considered very fully.

Mr. GROSVENOR. And now I am getting them before this Committee of the Whole to justify its interposition.

It appears that an unfortunate remark, as the gentleman who made it calls it, was made before the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and this seems to have caused the attitude which the committee has taken on this subject. I read a letter dated January 18, 1899—only a few days ago—from Dan C. Kingman, major of engineers, and addressed to the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee:

ENGINEER OFFICE, UNITED STATES ARMY,
Nashville, Tenn., January 18, 1899.

MY DEAR SIR: I have met to-day in Nashville a number of gentlemen who fear that my well-meant effort to reduce the cost of the improvement of Colbert Shoals, on the Tennessee River, would lead to a total failure of the appropriation, and the consequent detriment to commercial interests, and the disintegration and loss of the valuable force of trained laborers and mechanics which have been finally gotten together for the work.

I truly hope that this may not be so. Such a result would almost make me wish that I had stifled my conscience and permitted the work to go on upon the more expensive plan. If my approval of the proposed change and that of Col. Henry M. Robert, division engineer, are not thought sufficient, I can have all of the detailed plans and estimates ready by June 30, 1899 (the time when the money would be available), to be submitted to a board of engineers or to any experts that the Secretary of War might select. In any event, I could use two or three hundred thousand dollars to the best advantage this year in getting out stone and collecting other material, which must be had whichever plan is finally adopted.

The Colbert Shoals improvement has been very unfortunate in the matter of appropriations, and the work has gone on with exasperating slowness. We only got $50,000 in 1896 for the Tennessee below Chattanooga; so that our last appropriation practically was in 1894. The friends of the improvement are becoming discouraged. The best thing for the work would be a moderate appropriation for this year, with authority to resort to the continuous-contract method to the extent of not to exceed $1,500,000.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

DAN C. KINGMAN,
Major of Engineers.

Hon. THEO. BURTON, M. C.,
Chairman Committee on Rivers and Harbors,
House of Representatives.

Copy respectfully forwarded to Maj. W. A. Wills for his information.

D. C. K.

I call attention to this matter, not with any hope that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors will reconsider its action, but to show that I am not myself misled when I insist that the action of the committee was a most unfortunate abandonment of one of the most important public works of the United States, when such an abandonment for two more years, as is here proposed, will cost the Government, in the destruction of machinery and the erosion of the plant already constructed, more than five times the amount of the interest on the appropriation.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, the gentleman is entirely in error in his last statement. All that the engineer claims is that the appropriation asked will enable him to take care of the expensive machinery and other plants which have been assembled for the work, and to hold together a skilled force of engineers, mechanics, and laborers. He sent a communication to the committee in which he stated that he wanted to retain them and pay them their wages for the year to come; in other words, he wanted us to go on and pay $65,000 to $100,000 just to keep that force of men together. Why, sir, he got along on $50,000 for the whole reach from Chattanooga to the mouth of the river during the two or three years following 1896. Why must he now have $100,000? I earnestly hope the House will not be misled on this question.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Chairman, I move to amend by striking out the last word. I wish to say a few words in regard to the action of the committee in this particular.

Everyone who has kept up with river and harbor improvements knows that I have been personally very friendly to this Tennessee River improvement. Hence what I may say now comes not from one who is at all hostile.

I am afraid that this Committee of the Whole may have formed the impression from what my distinguished friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] has said that the failure to complete this improvement by which these shoals may be passed over will prevent absolutely any use whatever of that section of the Tennessee River. If such an impression has been created, I wish to say that it is entirely erroneous.

There is full, free, and ample navigation on that section of the river for quite seven months in the year. There is no difficulty whatever in the passing of steamboats up or down, from one end of that section to the other—that is to say, from Chattanooga to Florence, Ala., during that period of time in each year. And as a matter of fact the records show that they did transport in 1897, from Chattanooga to Florence, commerce which is estimated at a value of something over $1,000,000. That is an indication of the fact that commerce is not restricted on that reach of the river.

Now, Mr. Chairman, when this work of improvement is done, as I trust it will be done in time, it will not be of any special advantage to the commerce of the river except for the remaining five months in each year. Whether it will result in increasing the aggregate of commerce, of course no man can tell. I do not know. There is nothing before us to indicate or to enable us to form a satisfactory conclusion upon that point. Still I hope the improvement will be made.

But it should not be forgotten that this work calls for an enormous expenditure of money. In view of the uncertainty of the plans, as they were uncertain by reason of the statement of the engineer, the committee thought that there was no such emergency existing as would authorize the embarkation upon the work until a survey and suitable plan had been made and fully determined upon.

I think, therefore, that on reflection all fair-minded men who consider the matter impartially will justify the action of the committee. It was not suggested by any hostility on the part of the committee to the improvement in question. On the contrary, the committee have favored it, as the records will show. It is estimated that an expenditure of some five or six millions of dollars will be ultimately required to overcome the obstructions, and we do not feel justified in appropriating so large a sum; but we do appropriate a reasonable amount to carry the work forward gradually to its completion. It would not be necessary to make the entire appropriation, because it could not be available.

As I have already stated, there is free and unobstructed navigation on the river for over seven months every year, which is very much more, Mr. Chairman, than the navigation of the Ohio River, a much more important stream, on which there is a very much larger commerce, and where there is very much more necessity for continuous navigation. And yet the Ohio River has not been neglected.

We have been intending to improve that river so that it would be navigable for twelve months in the year by the construction of certain locks and dams where they are necessary, but no one, as far as I have been able to ascertain, claims that we should make an appropriation for the entire completion of that work in one year. No one has even made such a suggestion as that. They are content to take an appropriation for the construction of one or two of the dams at a time, and in this manner gradually secure the completion of the whole improvement. These expenditures, as a rule, involve, as gentlemen must know, many millions of dollars. The work must be done gradually, and it would be an absurd thing to suggest that the Treasury of the Government should be taxed, except gradually, to complete these works.

In addition to that, sir, I desire to state that the committee has been liberal in its estimates in this bill. An examination of previous bills will show we have been particularly liberal to the Tennessee River. Below Florence, Ala., where there are few obstructions on the river, there is a large commerce all the time. Above Chattanooga the same may be said to a certain extent. And the improvements upon the river generally are going along as rapidly as in the judgments of the engineers the work can be safely accomplished.

It is scarcely necessary that I should say on this floor that I have long been an advocate of these improvements of our rivers and harbors. Gentlemen know that as far as the improvement of the Tennessee River is concerned, I have been one of its most constant and strenuous advocates—persistently supporting the improvement of that river—ever since I have been a member of this body. And therefore, Mr. Chairman, I feel justified in claiming that the committee should be sustained in its action in this matter.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to say a word only in reply to the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] and my friend from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS].

I regret very much to hear the gentleman from Mississippi express the sentiment he has expressed of hostility to the motion or amendment I have made. He has been regarded as the very best friend of the Mississippi River in all of the country. And we thought that, in his devotion to the waterways of the country, he might give some consideration to the Tennessee River. But when Mississippi is involved Tennessee is not regarded by the gentlemen in appropriations.

Now, I do not regard the amendment that I have offered as a reflection in any sense on the action of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, but simply as bringing to the attention of that committee and the House matters which may have escaped their observation.

That committee, Mr. Chairman, is not infallible. Its members are not infallible. It is always the duty of members of the House plainly, fully, and in accordance with law to bring up for consideration on such occasions as this those matters which may have escaped the observation or attention of its committees.

It is not a reflection on the committee to suggest an amendment to their work when every fact in the record indicates that they are wrong.

I know, of course, that the committee must necessarily stand close together and support each other, lest the bill might go to pieces when it came to an equalization of appropriations for localities, and when the amounts received by the gentleman from Mississippi, the gentleman from Ohio, and other gentlemen on the committee, which they have gotten for their districts, are compared with those of us who are not fortunate enough to be on the committee or to control the influences that reach that committee.

The position taken by the gentleman from Ohio is not a sound one. I think he reflects unjustly upon the engineer in charge of this work. The engineer does not seek the appropriation "to hold together the laborers and preserve the working materials" on hand. But the statement is made expressly that the appropriation is necessary "to protect the machinery and save the Government from loss" in connection with the improvement. He says the work "is absolutely necessary" to be done, and that it will be done if the appropriation asked for is given; and that the appropriation can be used in the adoption of such other plan as may be determined upon with reference to the improvement at Colbert Shoals.

We are not insisting that the committee were in error in refusing to appropriate for that work at Colbert Shoals so long as there is a difference of opinion as to the propriety of the plan to be adopted. But we do insist that the inference of the committee that no work is needed between Chattanooga and Riverton is erroneous. We do insist that a misinterpretation has been put by the committee on the letter of the engineer. I know that that committee has no means of ascertaining the truth of the facts except from the engineers. They have no more capacity to determine those questions of engineering and public improvement as individual members of that committee than you or I have. They must of necessity go to the record made by the engineers for the facts; and appealing to that record, I say this committee are wrong and this amendment is just, not only to that section, but just to this Government, whose property and interests are sought to be protected by it.

Mr. REEVES. In reply to what the gentleman from Tennessee has said concerning the committee, let me suggest that we claim no patent upon the information furnished us by the engineers. But this whole question resolves itself fairly and squarely into this proposition: A project costing between five and six million dollars is before us. It is an uncertain one, and the engineer in charge of that river states to us as a committee that he believes he can propose a project that will save the Government more than a million dollars of this money. He further says, however, that if he could have this sum of a hundred thousand dollars he could keep his force of men together and could put them at work in the stone quarries, getting out stone that might be used either in the present project or one that he may propose hereafter. Now, the prime object of this enlarged appropriation asked for at this time, as stated by the engineer, is to keep this body of men at work getting out stone, which will commit us at least to an improvement of that river costing from four to six million dollars, when we do not know whether it ought to be done or whether it ought not.

Mr. MOON. May I ask the gentleman a question?

Mr. REEVES. In just a moment. Let me finish, please, and then I will yield. In that condition of this river, we feel that it is unfair to other commercial interests of the country about which there is no uncertainty, and which are demanding appropriations quite as urgently as this—we feel it unfair toward those commercial interests to adopt this project without knowing what we are doing. Now I will yield to the gentleman.

Mr. MOON. May I ask the gentleman a question now?

Mr. REEVES. Yes.

Mr. MOON. Does the gentleman propose to intimate by his remarks that the committee intend to abandon work on the Tennessee River, work already done, amounting to four or five million dollars?

Mr. REEVES. Not by any manner of means, but we do not propose to go any further while a part of this river has not been surveyed at any time and when the engineer in charge tells us that he thinks and believes he can give us a proposal which will save the Government a million dollars and accomplish the same end.

Mr. MOON. I agree with the gentleman exactly upon that proposition, that that appropriation, so large as a million dollars or any other considerable sum, for that particular point ought not to be made at this time. There is no difference in our contention there. I have tried to make the House understand that, but the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], as well as the gentleman who has just spoken, seems to avoid the exact issue that is here made and come to the language of this engineer. I deny that the statement the gentleman has made covers the whole proposition. I read from the report. The statement is correct as far as you have gone, but the whole statement should have been made.

> If Congress should see fit to authorize the Secretary of War to continue the improvement by a lateral canal or by locks and dams, whichever plan was the most economical and best, then the matter would have ample consideration and no time need be lost; but if Congress thinks that it is necessary to suspend judgment upon the matter for a year, we might still expend at least $100,000 most economically and advantageously in quarrying, cutting, and preparing the stone which will be needed in either case for the construction of the lock. This will enable us to take care of the expensive machinery and other plant which we have assembled for this work and to hold together our skilled force of engineers, mechanics, and laborers, which we have collected after much trouble and expense and which will be scattered and lost if we are unable to give them any employment for a year.

Now, he says that the work is necessary that we speak of, that it is desired; but in addition to that here is an immense plant, an immense amount of machinery, boats, dredges, tools, implements, and property of all sorts belonging to the Government which need protection. To protect and care for them, to carry on any sort of improvement, to make these surveys requires, he says, more money than you have given. I think the committee ought not to contend with us over that question. It is a small amount; it is just. It is requested by the engineers, and I hope there will be no objection to it.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. REEVES] has expired.

Mr. REEVES. Inasmuch as the gentleman from Tennessee has been speaking in my time, I ask for just a minute in which to answer him.

Mr. MOON. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes, as I occupied a portion of his time.

Mr. REEVES. I only want a moment.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman's time will be considered as extended five minutes.

Mr. REEVES. The gentleman from Tennessee persists in saying to the committee here that this sum of money is needed to take care of this plant or this machinery. I do not so understand the engineer.

We have appropriated or attempted to appropriate in this bill—at least we have made the proposal of $35,000, which is surely ample, and more than ample, for the purpose which he suggests. Now, the statement has been made by the engineer that money beyond this amount—now, I do not quote him verbatim, but in substance—can be used to keep this force at work in stone quarries, getting out stone which could be used in this new project. We did not believe that to be fair to the balance of the commercial interests, and therefore refused it, so far as the committee is concerned.

Mr. COX. Before the gentleman takes his seat, I want to get at the bottom of these facts. [Cries of "Vote!"]

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. MOON. Mr. Chairman, I do not want to be too persistent, but I want a division on this question.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 37, noes 81.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Improving Tennessee River above Chattanooga: Continuing improvement, $30,000.

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, I offer an amendment to that paragraph.

The Clerk read as follows:

> Insert in line 25, page 55, after the word "dollars," the following:
> "Provided, That out of said sum $5,000 shall be expended for the further improvement of the French Broad and Little Pigeon rivers, in addition to the $5,000 hereinbefore appropriated."

Mr. GIBSON. Mr. Chairman, that amendment does not call for any further appropriation. It only specifies in what manner the appropriation shall be expended, and I ask that no objection shall be made, inasmuch as it will be of more advantage to my people to have it expended in the manner provided in the amendment than in that provided in the bill. I do not see how the committee can object to it, as it does not cost the Government any more, but only provides the manner in which it shall be expended. I ask that the amendment be adopted.

Mr. BURTON. I want to say, Mr. Chairman, that a request was made to the committee, and the reply was made that if the members from that locality would concur in the proposed amendment, the committee would have no objection. I understood, however, that there was a division of opinion between them in regard to it. If there is not a difference of opinion, and the members from that section will agree to it, there is no objection.

Mr. COX. What section?

Mr. BURTON. East Tennessee.

Mr. GIBSON. It is not in your district at all.

Mr. COX. Well, I have a little interest in Tennessee, whether it is in my own district or not.

The question was taken; and the Chairman announced that the noes seemed to have it.

Mr. GIBSON. Division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 17, noes 34.

Mr. GIBSON. I call for tellers, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. Six gentlemen have arisen—not a sufficient number; tellers are refused. The noes have it, and the amendment is rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Obion River, Tennessee: For maintenance, $2,500.

Mr. HEPBURN. I move to strike out the last word. Mr. Chairman, a newspaper this morning made the statement that Mr. HEPBURN yesterday made his usual annual speech against the river and harbor bill. [Laughter.] Another newspaper said that seventeen years ago Mr. HEPBURN made a speech against the river and harbor bill and repeated it on yesterday. [Renewed laughter.] That is a mistake, Mr. Chairman; he did not repeat all of it, at least, yesterday. [Renewed laughter.]

The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] will remember that on one occasion, about twelve years ago, the State of Ohio, being the owner of a worn-out and worthless improvement on one of its rivers, the Muskingum, sought to unload it upon the Government of the United States.

There were some water rights owned by citizens of Ohio, I think in perpetuity, for which they paid a slight rental, and the State of Ohio, in order to preserve these water rights, was required to make a much larger annual expenditure. There was no commerce on the river to speak of, and in order to avoid this annual expenditure the gentleman from Ohio, with that great persuasiveness that always characterizes him, and that sometimes is banefully used, at least on river and harbor bills, persuaded the Government to assume the ownership and control of the work. Ohio gave it to the Government! [Laughter.] I took the liberty of saying at that time that the improvement was worthless, that the dams were in ruins, that the locks were rotting, that there was but little commerce, and that in a little while the gentleman from Ohio would come to Congress demanding large appropriations for the improvement of the waterway.

I can remember the virtuous indignation with which the gentleman repelled that assault. I "was mistaken about it!" I "had no information upon the subject!" In fact, yesterday, when I listened to the gentleman from Texas [Mr. BALL] discussing my ignorance, I thought he was plagiarizing from the gentleman from Ohio.

Now, Mr. Chairman, we have some information on this question. The United States up to nearly two years ago had expended upon this great artery of commerce $1,173,339.66.

Mr. BURTON. I beg the pardon of the gentleman from Iowa, but I did not hear what improvement he is speaking of.

Mr. HEPBURN. It is not in this bill at all.

Mr. BURTON. Is it the Muskingum River?

Mr. HEPBURN. The Muskingum River. In the year 1897 the Government expended $96,879 in maintenance, or, perhaps, in improvements. This last year the Government has expended $41,000. The total tonnage of all the freight moved on that river, as shown by this report, was 65,000 tons, less than 3,000 carloads of freight, and yet we have expended more than one million and a quarter of dollars in the last twelve years upon that "great improvement." I refer to this, Mr. Chairman, not that I can effect anything, because these expenditures are now paid out of a lump appropriation under the act of 1884.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I would like a minute or two more to conclude what I have to say before I get my punishment from the gentleman from Ohio. [Laughter.]

A MEMBER. I ask that the gentleman have five minutes more.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the request will be granted.

There was no objection.

Mr. COX. Now, Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HEPBURN. I do not desire to be interrupted, if my friend will excuse me. I refer to this for the purpose of showing how inconsiderate gentlemen of the committee are in putting appropriations of this character upon the bill and making possible these outrages. I do not charge my friend from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] with intentional misstatement in the prophecies he indulged in twelve years ago in regard to this improvement. We only hold him to the extremest accuracy when he is prophesying in regard to political future events [laughter] and not when he is talking about expenditures of money, at least when they affect the State of Ohio. [Laughter.]

I think I have a right to call attention to this matter for the purpose of challenging other improvements that are in this bill now. We can not to-day tell just what they are in their enormity, just as we could not tell the measure of the wrong that was done to the United States when the charitable gift from the State of Ohio was accepted twelve years ago. I can not recall all that the gentleman from Ohio said on that occasion, because it happened twelve years ago, but I do remember that we were then told that this was a necessity to commerce; we were then told that great good would come to the people of a populous region; we were then told that this was to be a corrective of railway freights and would put down extortion and annihilate trusts, and would accomplish all these virtuous results that gentlemen talk about and have in their mind's eye apparently when they are putting their hands into the Treasury to help a particular locality. This much of my annual speech I did not make yesterday. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman,

The sheeted dead did squeak and gibber in the Roman streets.

If my friend were engaged in the business of resurrecting from the past all his disappointments and misfortunes in attacking the river and harbor bill, he would find plenty of field of operation for months to come. He accuses the gentleman from Texas of having charged him with ignorance and, in doing so, making a draft on a former speech of mine. The gentleman ought to know that the common stock of knowledge on that subject is much more available than any speech I may have made on any former occasion, and I presume the gentleman from Texas simply drew on the common stock we already have when the question of this river and harbor is under discussion.

Let us see how plain a tale will put to flight the gentleman's—I will not call it attack on me, but his illustration of himself. [Laughter.] Long before I was a member of Congress the legislature of Ohio passed an act ceding to the General Government the improvement of the Muskingum River. I had nothing to do with it any more than the gentleman has with the enactments of the Iowa legislature. Long prior to my coming to Congress this House and Congress had appropriated over $400,000 to the improvement of the Muskingum River in building an ice harbor at the mouth, prior to the cession by the State legislature and prior to my entry into Congress, made under an appropriation bill, when Mr. Van Vorhes, of Athens, and General Warner, of Marietta, were Representatives of that Congressional district.

When I came here I was charged with the duty of carrying out the plan of the State government in its tender of these works, and I did what any other member of Congress would have done. I introduced an amendment to the river and harbor appropriation bill accepting the cession by the State. The gentleman is entirely at fault in regard to these water rights, and surely he does not draw upon any speech of mine for that information. There were certain perpetual rights in the surplus water of the river, just as there are rights in the surplus water of the canals of the various States. These rights—one of them at Zanesville—grew out of the fact that the land upon either shore was ceded, if I recollect, for the purpose of enabling the State government to build a dam and lock; and in consideration of that he was given the right to use the surplus water in perpetuity; and there were perhaps one or two other cases of the same character. The bill accepting the cession to the General Government of course recognized those vested and perpetual rights, but as to all the other water rights, which are very numerous—mills at Marietta and various manufacturing establishments along the river—they had their rights under leases made with the board of public works from one year to another; and those leases were all handed over by the State to the Federal Government, which either collected the water rents, or renewed the leases, or put an end to them, just as the engineers in charge saw fit. In other words, the Government of the United States took exactly the place of the State of Ohio in respect to every one of those interests.

Now, then, I may say that at that time I knew very little more about the works on the river—the locks and the dams—than did the gentleman from Iowa. I will frankly say now that if I had known the character of those works at that time I should not have been quite as zealous as I was in securing the action of Congress. But we had to rely upon the reports of the engineers—both the State engineer and the Government engineers——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Ohio has expired.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I should like to have five minutes more.

Mr. CLARK of Missouri. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman be allowed five minutes to conclude his remarks. His statement is very interesting.

The CHAIRMAN. If there be no objection, the gentleman will continue his remarks for five minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. GROSVENOR. As I was saying, we had to rely upon the reports of the engineers, the State engineer, who had made the survey of the works, as well as the Government engineers.

Now, when the river was accepted by the General Government and the engineers took possession of it they, of course, criticised the old works which had belonged to the State. They did exactly what the General Government has done in the case of the Green River and the Kentucky River and some works up in Michigan and everywhere where the march of engineering improvement has required additional and different sort of construction. So that from time to time, under the revised plans of the Government, new works have been put in there, new locks and new dams, and from Marietta to Zanesville there is now 6 feet of water all the year around, one of the best pieces of navigable water in all that section of the Union.

Since that time a railroad has paralleled the public work, right along the river bank, all the way from Zanesville to Marietta, and of course that has detracted in a large degree from the traffic of the river. But I say that is one of the most perfect works in the United States, standing in one of the richest valleys of the world, in the midst of a splendid population, connecting three or four great lines of railroad, and furnishing to the people along the river bank one of the best improvements in this country.

Now, while it has cost a great deal of money (and that cost in a large degree—to the extent of nearly half of the amount which the gentleman has referred to—was the expenditure of money in an ice harbor at the mouth of the Muskingum River, to which I have already referred and which took place before I had anything whatever to do with the matter), while the expenditure has been large, the value is there, and this House and this committee would not think of such a thing as abandoning that work if members could go there and look at it to-day.

Mr. SIMPSON. I hope the gentleman will tell us whether the statement of the gentleman from Iowa is correct, about the small amount of commerce over that river.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I have already spoken of that. I have not the figures. I am bound to suppose that the gentleman has given them correctly. As I have stated, the paralleling of the river right along its bank from Marietta to Zanesville by the railroad has had a great deal to do with lessening the tonnage on that river.

Mr. McCULLOCH. The gentleman will allow me to ask him whether the improvement of the river has not controlled the rates on that railroad?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Everybody understands that that is so. I thank my friend for his suggestion. The rates of railroad transportation are absolutely controlled by the presence of that river with its improved navigation. Some people talk about this as a myth, as a small matter; but, sir, there is no better illustration of the wonderful value of water transportation in competing with the railroads, and thereby controlling their exactions, than the Muskingum River from Zanesville to Marietta, 65 miles, through a great producing country.

Mr. BURTON. I move that all debate on the pending paragraph be now closed.

The motion was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Forked Deer River, Tennessee: For maintenance, $3,000.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I am very grateful to the gentleman from Ohio for the frank and candid manner in which he has corroborated nearly all that I said. I would have been glad if in the spirit of truthfulness——

Mr. BURTON. I must make a point of order that this discussion is not at all upon this bill. I am very much interested in the discussion, but it pertains to something entirely outside, and I trust that my colleague from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] and the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN] will find some other and more convenient season for their controversy, rather than when this bill is under consideration.

Mr. HEPBURN. Mr. Chairman, the improvement of the Deep River involves some resort to prophesy when we attempt to discuss its advantages. It may be that Deep River by being improved——

Mr. BURTON. The paragraph under consideration relates to Forked Deer River.

Mr. HEPBURN. I thank the gentleman for his suggestion. I take it that the benefit to be derived——

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I really must insist on the point of order. I think we ought to discuss this bill.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is not the bill being discussed?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Iowa is familiar with the rule that during the five-minute debate remarks must be germane to the pending proposition.

Mr. HEPBURN. "The gentleman from Iowa" has heard that suggestion before, both from the Chair and from gentlemen on the floor, and he will, as nearly as he can, conform to the letter and the spirit of the rule. I say that no man can tell whether advantage will come to the United States by the improvement of Deep River——

Several MEMBERS. Deer River.

Mr. HEPBURN. Very well; Deer River.

I want to suggest also to the gentleman that the mere fact of the appropriation finding a place here, in a bill of this character, does not prove that the improvement is going to be of the slightest value to the public. And in support of that assertion, Mr Chairman, I wish to call the attention of the committee to what was said a long time ago—twelve years ago or more—about the improvement of the Muskingum River. [Laughter.] You can not make this a "great artery of commerce" by putting it in an appropriation bill any more than you could have made the Muskingum River an artery of commerce by the same process [laughter]; and in support of that assertion I call upon the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. GROSVENOR] himself and his concessions in that respect, because his plea for the support of the appropriation was nearly all of it a confession and an avoidance; and in that confession he has admitted that the same character of charge that was made by himself and by others against the proposition then under consideration might have been made against the improvement of that river. [Laughter.] I mean, of course, Mr. Chairman, the suggestion that has been made to-day as well as the suggestion that was then made with reference to that improvement.

Here has been a large expenditure of public money on an alleged improvement on that river. Here is an expenditure of many hundreds of thousands of dollars, appropriated and to be used in the great State of Ohio. Here we must assume a large expenditure is to follow the expenditure we are now seeking to make. Here is a concession also of the absence of commerce, and the absence of a necessity for the improvement——

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair will have to state to the gentleman from Iowa, in view of the fact that the point of order has been made, that in conformity with the uniform rule the gentleman from Iowa should confine himself to the matter under consideration.

Mr. HEPBURN. Do you mean to "strike out the last word?" [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. To the amendment the gentleman has proposed.

Mr. HEPBURN. Is it necesary to confine myself to the "last word?" I have been trying, if possible, to have the last word. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair thinks the gentleman himself has occupied the chair in Committee of the Whole often enough to know what the rule is when attention has been specifically called to it.

Mr. HEPBURN. I think the Chair is entirely correct if the gentleman in charge of the bill insists on the point of order, and therefore I will desist. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Big Sandy River, Kentucky and West Virginia: Continuing improvement, $52,500: Provided, That a contract or contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to complete one lock and dam in the Big Sandy River between Louisa and the mouth of the Big Sandy River, in accordance with the report of Major Bixby, April 27, 1898, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate $220,000, exclusive of the amount herein and heretofore appropriated: Provided further, That of the amount authorized to be expended, $1,000 may be expended for maintenance on Leviza Fork, and $1,500 on Tug Fork, and $20,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, for a detailed survey of the Big Sandy River and Leviza and Tug forks of the same in Kentucky and West Virginia.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move an amendment at this point, and I am frank to say that I do not think it necessary, but it has been believed better to insert it so as to make the provision more specific.

The CHAIRMAN. The amendment will be read.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend by inserting after the word "Virginia," in line 24, on page 50, the words:

"Provided, That the rest of the amount may be used for the local survey, acquisition of site, and commencement of construction of the above-named lock and dam."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Saginaw River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $40,000.

Mr. BRUCKER. Mr. Chairman, I move a pro forma amendment for the purpose of making a suggestion.

I notice in the river and harbor bills passed heretofore, appropriating money for the improvement of the Saginaw River, there has always been a limitation in the shape of an apportionment of the appropriation, dividing it between the different points of the river. Providing, for instance, that a portion shall be expended above and a portion below points named in the river. I notice in the pending bill, however, that no such provision is made, and that there is no limitation with reference to the point where expenditure should be made. The language reads as follows:

Improving Saginaw River, Michigan: Continuing improvement, $40,000.

I would like to ask the chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors whether or not, by the use of the language as it appears in the bill, it is the intention of the committee to leave the expenditure to the discretion of the local engineer as to where the amount should be expended in the improvement of the river.

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the gentleman from Michigan, who will answer.

Mr. BISHOP. Mr. Chairman, in reference to the question of my friend from Michigan, I will state that I drew the language of this provision myself. After a conference with the engineer in charge of the work, he thought, if the appropriation were left in this manner, to his discretion, he could divide it better, as far as the improvement of the river is concerned, than to make the appropriation in the ordinary form heretofore used.

Mr. BRUCKER. By reference to the "engineer in charge" my friend refers to Colonel Lydecker, of Detroit?

Mr. BISHOP. Yes; I refer to the engineer in charge.

Mr. BURTON. Permit me to say in this connection that the committee have been reluctant to impose limitations on the expenditure of these amounts, except where in their judgment it was found to be necessary.

Mr. BRUCKER. Permit me to say, Mr. Chairman, knowing the qualifications and the capacity of the gentleman referred to, the engineer in charge, I am perfectly satisfied that the expenditure of this money could not be placed in better hands. It is much better to leave it, in my judgment, to the local engineer in charge of the improvement than to undertake to limit him by any language which might be employed in the bill itself.

I withdraw the pro forma amendment.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will proceed with the reading of the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Missouri River: For the removal of obstructions in the Missouri River above Sioux City, Iowa, $50,000.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Amend, after line 20, page 67, by inserting the following:
"To continue improvements at Bismarck, Pierre (both sides), Yankton, Elk Point, and Sioux City (both sides), $200,000; the allotment of this amount to be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War."

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Chairman, it is probably unnecessary for me to add to what I said yesterday in support of this proposed amendment. I have drafted the amendment in accordance with the language used by the Board of Engineers, which I quoted in the remarks which I submitted yesterday. That recommendation is in this language:

It is understood to be the intention of Congress to continue improvements at Bismarck, Pierre (both sides), Yankton, Elkpoint, and Sioux City (both sides); and for the purpose of economical work at those localities an estimate of $250,000 is submitted, with recommendation that the allotment of this amount be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

Desiring, so far as possible, to conform to the position of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, in reducing the estimates, I have cut the amount down from $250,000 to $200,000. It seems to me, and I think also to the other gentlemen on this floor who are interested in this appropriation, that it is unjust to abandon the improvements that have been inaugurated at the points named.

While it is true that on the Lower Missouri River, under the care of the Missouri River Commission, a very large amount is carried under the continuing-contract system, which I understand it is not the purpose of the committee to change or abandon, yet I submit to this committee as to whether this implied contract made by the Government of the United States is not entitled to consideration in the same light that a written contract is.

I undertook yesterday to name some of the considerations why I thought this small appropriation should be made. It is probably useless for me to repeat those observations or to enlarge upon them. It is a simple, direct proposition, and it seems to me that it would be unwise for the Government to withdraw from the work already begun when comparatively a small amount will perpetuate and continue and make permanent that work.

It seems to me unwise to abandon the Upper Missouri River altogether, unwise in the judgment of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors themselves, for in this bill they have continued the appropriation of $50,000 for the purpose of removing obstructions in that portion of the river. I hope very earnestly that this amendment, submitted not only in the interest of my own locality, but in the interest of northeastern Nebraska, South Dakota, North Dakota, and Montana, that the policy that Congress may now declare will not be in the line of the recommendation of the committee, to abandon this great river, so far as the improvements hereafter to be authorized are concerned.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, I trust that the House will consider carefully what the gentleman from Iowa has said. We from the Northwest have, for all these years, cheerfully supported these great river and harbor bills, not because the expenditures were made inside of the borders of our districts or States. We have taken a broader view than that. The bulk of this money is expended in New York Harbor, along the lakes, along the Gulf shore, and we get our share of those benefits. By removing the obstructions in those great harbors you make easy our access to the sea for our staple products, and in that way we get our benefit as integral parts of the great nation. But there are other items in the bill of a more or less local nature. Even these, through all these years, we have cheerfully supported.

Take, for instance, "Porcupine Island," $10,000; "Cape Porpoise," $70,000; "Woods Hole Channel," $20,000; "Salt Pond," $25,000, "Sand Beach," $50,000. These are points along the New England coast not accessible to through traffic from our part of the country. We of the Northwest know very little of the necessity for these expenditures, but we trust to the judgment of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and we sustain them cheerfully.

Then along the South Atlantic and Gulf coast take the "Mystic River," $50,000. How many of you can tell where the "Mystic River" is? Yet there is as much appropriated in this bill for the "Mystic River" as for the Missouri River above Sioux City, with its 1,600 miles of navigable water. "Deep Creek," $25,000; "Ocmulgee River," $20,000; "Suwanee River," $5,000. Well, now, there is a sentiment, there is a melody and a music and a romantic tradition about the "Suwanee River" which would disarm any criticism. We cheerfully support that item without any regard for its commercial relations to us.

But here is the St. Johns River, only a short stretch of river in Florida, which carries an appropriation of $40,000, almost as much as you give for nearly 2,000 miles of river on the Upper Missouri, the longest river in the world, longer than the Amazon, longer than the Mississippi.

"The Tombigbee River!" Whoever heard of the Tombigbee River? It is a local stream, and it carries in this appropriation $66,000, which is $16,000 more than you give to the upper 1,600 miles of the Missouri River, a river that is known wherever the English language is known.

We have rather a sparse population in that part of the country, but we have great natural resources to be developed. The gentleman from Montana, for instance, and I represent contiguous districts, and yet, neighbors as we are at home, there is intervening between my house and his 850 miles of territory. We have no north and south railroads; we have only east and west roads.

The Missouri River is not paralleled by railroads, like the short Muskingum River in Ohio, spoken of a few minutes ago. We must depend, therefore, entirely for north and south transportation on wagons and steamboats. We have the Canadian Pacific, the Great Northern, the Northern Pacific, and the Union Pacific, all great transcontinental railroads, with very few branches, but none of them north and south roads. Here I hold in my hand an amateur photograph taken last summer near Bismarck, the capital of North Dakota. There you see photographed a vein of lignite coal 7½ feet thick, a mile and half long, cropping out of the clay banks of the river; and yet, easily accessible as that coal is in winter, when the farmers can drive their sledges on the ice of the Missouri River right under it and shoot coal down to their sleds, it could be made accessible in summer also with a small expenditure for harbors. We have 20,000 square miles——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. I will ask the House to give me five minutes more.

There was no objection.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. We have 20,000 square miles of land underlaid with such coal up and down both sides of the river near Bismarck. In some places the vein is 15 feet thick. It is inaccessible. It is worthless now on account of lack of transportation facilities. We ask of you not to abandon these works that have been undertaken by the Government for the improvement of the navigation of that stream. It is not a small stream. Why, even its tributaries are great. You seldom think of its navigable tributaries above Bismarck. And yet this Government on one very historic and momentous occasion employed a thousand miles of the tributary waters above Bismarck to carry its wounded to a place of shelter and hospital service.

Twenty-two years ago last summer, when the Custer massacre occurred, unfortunately there were no wounded that needed any attention of the seven companies under Custer; but of the five companies of the Seventh Cavalry, under the command of Major Reno, there was a large percentage of wounded to be cared for. The surgeon had been killed, and all the assistant surgeons but one young man had been killed in the massacre. Dr. Porter had charge of these poor fellows, and had them carried on improvised litters, made of blankets and poplar poles, 25 miles, where they were put on a steamboat, during the June freshet, and there, for a thousand miles over the navigable waters of the Little Big Horn and the Yellowstone and the Missouri, for fifty-five hours they ran at the tremendous speed of 18 miles an hour, and the steamer Far West carried these poor wounded fellows to the nearest place where they could find pillows and medicines and shelter for these men.

That gives you something of an idea of the distances in the interior of our country, when we have to carry the wounded a thousand miles to find hospital care. This great stretch of territory, meandered by great and historic waters, is comparatively without railroad facilities. We have great natural resources, and we are not asking for millions. We are not asking for something that has not been estimated for by the Board of Engineers. We are simply asking that you will continue in the bill $200,000 of the $250,000 that the engineer said was absolutely necessary to preserve the Government works which have been undertaken and which are now in process of erection along that stream. It is a very modest request. It is a reasonable request, and I ask that this House stand by the amendment offered by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Chairman, the Missouri River is one of the great rivers of the world. The Mississippi and Missouri rivers are navigable from New Orleans to Sioux City by the large boats that traverse the river from St. Louis to New Orleans. In a full sense it is a navigable river, the boats passing not as frequently as formerly, but still they are occasionally passing up and down the river, and have been for many years. The Government recognizes the fact that this is a navigable river, and every license for a bridge that is constructed across the river has a provision that it shall be elevated high enough so that boats can pass beneath it or shall have a draw in it. Now, the fact that there are but few boats running at the present time is no argument against the river itself. Improvements have been made there.

A large amount has been expended by the Government to protect the banks of the river, and it is demonstrated that they can be made stationary by what is called riprapping. At Sioux City and opposite and above for some distance the banks are protected in this manner, and it is necessary that they should be repaired and kept in good order, so that the river when it rises, as it does every spring, will not overflow the riprapping. These improvements have been made there to protect the banks, and the riprap must be of sufficient height to be above high water; otherwise the overflow would cut the earth out from behind the riprapping and injure or destroy it.

My friend from southwestern Iowa stated that $375,000 had been appropriated for certain purposes on the river and had been misapplied. If that had been applied in the manner intended, I think he would have had no cause to complain that the city of Hamburg, Iowa, was in danger of being injured or destroyed by the river. The Government has made improvements at various points on the river by riprapping, and there is great danger, unless these improvements are protected, that they will be more or less injured by the high water.

The sum asked and recommended by the engineers, as I understand, is $250,000. Shall we make appropriations for little streams at various points and neglect this great river, a river of such a volume of water that the Yellowstone and the Platte rivers do not appear to increase the volume? A dozen such rivers as the Connecticut might flow into it and scarcely appreciably increase the volume of water. It is one of the great rivers of the world, and to say that you will not protect the banks of that stream, and still make improvements on little rivulets, seems to me a neglect of duty on the part of the House, if it should pass a bill of that kind, as I think it will not do.

It seems to me the appropriation asked for is absolutely essential. It is claimed that the railroads transact the business that was formerly transacted on the river. The river is in better condition now than it was twenty years ago. The timber has been cut off the banks, and there are fewer snags than formerly. The effect of riprapping has been to make a channel that clears its own way and protects the river from overflowing, and there is no question whatever but in a few years steamboats will again be running on the river for the transportation of merchandise which is now carried on the railroads.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. I have a word to say to the members of this committee upon the proposition now before the House. I am absolutely astonished that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors brought in such a bill as is here presented to this body. I shall ask for some member of the committee or the chairman of the committee to give some satisfactory explanation to this body why certain omissions were made, noticeably in the West, a section of this country which, if it is secondary in population, certainly is not in other respects; and I believe all sections of this country are entitled to just and equal treatment. I believe that in the appropriation and the expenditure of public money equal and exact justice should be the underlying principle governing the action of this body; but I say that justice has not been dealt out, so far as the provisions of this bill are concerned.

And I want to say that whoever undertakes to defend this bill as it stands at present should not undertake to shield themselves behind the flimsy barrier erected here, that no money is appropriated by this bill except for navigable streams. Though even upon that score we claim the justice of this amendment. But if we were to waive that, we find from the speech of the gentleman from Mississippi [Mr. CATCHINGS] yesterday, in reply to the criticisms of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], that millions and millions of dollars have been appropriated and carried in this and former bills, not for the purposes of navigation, if you please, but for the protection of the people living along the Mississippi River. I will read a part of the gentleman's remarks:

> Thirty-two thousand square miles of magnificent land will have been protected from overflow. A distinguished writer has said that the Mississippi Valley is like a jug of cream; that the richest soil from the Western States has been washed down by the river and used in building up this magnificent empire; and it is true. It is scarcely yet touched by the husbandman.
> Go to my district, and I will show you primeval forests, magnificent, gigantic, and splendid to behold, which remain to be felled to make room for the farmer of this country. I undertake to say that the small pittance of $13,000,000 donated by the Government has given more hope to more American hearts and has rendered more actual and immediate benefit to the people of this country than any other sum which it has expended anywhere for any other purpose. [Applause.]

Now, I say, Mr. Chairman, what is right and just for the people living along the banks of the Mississippi River is no less right when applied to the people of the great West living along the banks of the Missouri River. The Missouri River is not known as Goose Creek or some other euphonious name to which we have listened to-day, unknown to commerce and geography alike, and rescued from oblivion only by the magnanimity of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors in allowing them to share in the large appropriations carried in this bill. It is only when you refer to the Mississippi River in conjunction with the Missouri River that you can point to the great father of waters in the American continent. Yet, except immediately above Sioux City, Iowa, not a single dollar is given for the protection of the people residing adjacent to the banks of that stream and no assistance whatever for navigation.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, I would like five minutes more.

Mr. BISHOP. I object.

The CHAIRMAN. Objection is made.

Mr. BURTON. I should be willing that the gentleman from South Dakota should have five minutes more, but I trust the discussion will be immediately closed. I want to say a word upon this question, however. I desire to say that I am in favor of liberal river and harbor improvements, and I should like to see a bill in this House that would carry an appropriation of fifty millions. I am satisfied it would be of great benefit to the country, but I doubt if the House would pass any such bill, and the public sentiment of the country would not sustain it. It is first necessary for us to relieve these river and harbor bills from some of the excrescences upon them, and to avoid some of the waste which has been incident to our appropriations for these purposes in the past.

Among these items of waste, these excrescences, if I may call them such, I think this under consideration is one of the worst. In the first place, it is an absurdity. This is a river and harbor bill, making appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors; and confessedly these amounts are to be expended in the protection of the banks of a river where it is not claimed that any appreciable commerce exists to-day.

Now, I want to call attention to a second feature of the absurdity of this proposition. This amendment professes to make provision for harbors along that river before the river itself is improved and before there is any commerce on it or any chance for commerce.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit an interruption?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. KELLEY. Is not the gentleman aware that there is commerce on the Missouri River above Sioux City?

Mr. BURTON. I will come to that point in a minute. I will read statistics for the satisfaction of the gentleman.

Mr. KELLEY. I think we have a right to expect the chairman of the committee not to make such a statement as we have just listened to.

Mr. BURTON. I believe I said "trivial" commerce, or words to that effect. Here are the statistics:

	Tons.
Coal and wood	4,045
Grain, hay, and straw	4,728
Lumber	1,143
Sand, lime, and cement	1,953
General merchandise and miscellaneous	4,901

A good deal less than 20,000 tons a year.

Mr. JOHNSON of North Dakota. At what point is that?

Mr. BURTON. It is for the whole river. I refer to page 1848 of the reports of the engineers.

Mr. KELLEY. Will the gentleman permit a further interruption?

Mr. BURTON. I will, but I hope the gentleman will be brief.

Mr. KELLEY. Is it not a fact, and is it not apparent to the chairman of the committee, that one reason why this appropriation is asked is that the river may be made more navigable than at present, so that we may increase commerce there, where we have small railroad facilities?

Mr. BURTON. How is the commerce to be improved by expending thirty or forty thousand dollars at Pierre, at Elkpoint, at Yankton, and other places of that kind?

Mr. KELLEY. By causing the current to flow in one channel. At present the current shifts. We want to force the river to remain in one channel, so that a pilot going down the river to-day may, when he comes back in a week or two, know where the channel is. There is sufficient flow of water; the difficulty is that the channel changes. That is all the trouble with the Missouri River.

Mr. BURTON. In other words, the proposition is that this ungovernable stream, 1,600 miles long, shall be improved at points two and three hundred miles apart so as to make it navigable. That is the kind of argument with which this proposition is supported. Before we enter into an improvement of this nature we ought to know where we are going to land.

Mr. KELLEY. That stream is navigable——

Mr. BURTON. I must decline to yield further. I think I have stated the case fairly. I have given the tonnage for a series of years. I will repeat the figures for the benefit of the House.

Mr. PERKINS. That is not necessary.

Mr. BURTON. Here are the figures:

Amount of freight carried on the Missouri River above Sioux City.

Calendar year.	Tons.	Calendar year.	Tons.
1887	13,961	1893	19,481
1888	12,895	1894	37,936
1889	16,723	1895	21,264
1890	14,072	1896	10,368
1891	14,211	1897	17,105
1892	17,209

In a commercial community we do not call that amount of transportation commerce. There are fifteen or twenty ports in the United States in urgent need of appropriations that have more commerce between noon and night of a single day than the whole Missouri River for 1,660 miles. We are compelled to turn down requests for an increase in the size of channels in numerous harbors on the Atlantic coast and the Gulf and on the Great Lakes, where, as I said, they have more commerce in a single day than this river has in a whole year.

They have been seeking to build what they call ice harbors over the whole length of the river at an enormous cost. Let us see the total number of boats on the whole stream:

The number of boats engaged in carrying freight and passengers is 11, with a total tonnage of 1,275 tons.

Why, gentlemen, we had better buy every one of those eleven boats and burn them, rather than to try to provide in the several towns on this river ice harbors to take care of them.

Mr. PERKINS. There are only one or two ice harbors.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] does not wish to convey the impression that this is a new work?

Mr. BURTON. I admit that it is an old work; but, as I said yesterday in response to a question of the gentleman from Delaware [Mr. HANDY], the fact that we have wasted public money in the past does not seem to me any reason why we should waste it in the future.

It has been urged here that there is a pressing necessity that this work be done at this time. In reply to that I wish only to read briefly from the last Report of the Chief of Engineers. Let us see whether there is any necessity for this work.

We will first take the Bismarck Harbor, with reference to which the engineers say:

The works constructed and completed during the year have protected the left bank, just below the bridge, and have given a more favorable direction to the channel above the bridge.

Not a word about the necessity of further expenditure in that direction.

Now let us take Pierre and Fort Pierre. They say:

The expenditures during the fiscal year have been $13,551.95. The incomplete 1895 dike at Pierre has been completed, and the lower end of Marion Island has been protected by two dikes and a revetment 1,230 feet long below them, the dikes extending out to the proposed rectification line. Minor repairs to the Marion Island dikes and revetment and to the dikes in front of Fort Pierre have been made during the present spring. The works have nearly stopped the erosion below the Pierre steamboat landing, having formed a large accretion, and have protected that part of Marion Island covered by them. A marked improvement in the crossing between Pierre and Fort Pierre has also been effected.

I call the gentleman's attention to that statement of the engineers.

Now let us take the Yankton appropriation:

The plant needed for beginning the work has been procured. Six of the proposed right-bank dikes have been begun and will be carried out as far as available funds will permit. The erosion of the right bank in the vicinity of the dikes, which was formerly rapid, has been checked, but the dikes have not yet been extended sufficiently to produce any decided change in the position of the channel.

That is the report, as far as the protection of property is concerned in that locality.

At South Sioux City—

I read from the report—

At South Sioux City.—The Nebraska bank of the Missouri River in front of South Sioux City had been protected for about 4,000 feet upstream from the lower bridge and for about 5,400 feet upstream from the upper bridge, by revetments constructed by the owners of the respective bridges. Between these two revetments about 4,270 linear feet of bank was unprotected and was being rapidly eroded. The present project, adopted July 24, 1896, contemplates the expenditure of the funds provided by the river and harbor act of June 3, 1896, in revetting this unprotected bank, in repaving the upper bank for 300 feet farther upstream, and in protecting the head of the work by a short pile dike. The project contemplated the expenditure of $50,000, but as it was believed that the work could be done for the $40,000 allotted, no modification of the project was made. The work forms part of a general plan, described under the next heading, for the improvement of the river in this vicinity.

To June 30, 1897, there had been expended $35,674.36. The work had been completed. Its results had been the stopping of the erosion on the formerly unprotected portion of the town front.

The expenditures during the year have been $4,080.48. A combined pile driver and hydraulic grader and four skiffs have been constructed, and a towboat purchased, a part of its cost being paid from the allotment for work at Yankton. The plant is intended for use in the lower part of the district as may be required.

The work at South Sioux City remains in good condition, and has protected the front.

Mr. PERKINS. But will the gentleman come to the conclusion contained in the recommendation of the engineer, in which he sums up all that has been done and what is required?

Mr. BURTON. Of course I propose to do that. I will read the extract:

The expenditures during the year have been $18,098.97. The Iowa bank has been protected by revetment for 824 feet next below the Floyd River, below which 20 short dikes have been built, and shore protection and foot mattress for 3 other dikes constructed. The mattress for one of the latter is an extension of the revetment. It is thought from present conditions that their completion may prove unnecessary, the mattress laid being a sufficient protection to the bank. By the revetment and dikes the front has been protected for about 7,400 linear feet. The works are in good condition and have thus far fulfilled their purpose.

It is understood to be the intention of Congress to continue improvements at Bismarck, Pierre (both sides), Yankton, Elkpoint, and Sioux City (both sides); and for the purpose of economical work at those localities an estimate of $250,000 is submitted, with recommendation that the allotment of this amount be left to the discretion of the Secretary of War.

I take it this body has as much to do in determining what is the intention of Congress as the engineers.

So it will be seen that there is no special urgency there.

Mr. MAXWELL. But, Mr. Chairman, if the gentleman will permit me, I ask, why not make the appropriation, in view of the fact that the necessity for it is recognized on all hands——

Mr. BURTON. But it will be seen that it would be regarded as mandatory, practically. Now, I wish to say to the gentleman that it will be well to read further. I read from page 2182 of the Report of the Engineers for 1897:

In the value thus obtained was included that of so much of the farm land between Elkpoint and the river, of the town property, and of the railroad property as lay within a curve of fairly probable erosion.

The results of the survey have shown that to properly improve the reach, giving to the works as full security as is ordinarily obtainable on the Missouri, it would be necessary to begin the work at the bluff contact, 5½ miles above Elkpoint, and to extend it progressively down stream.

Again:

As there is no present or prospective river commerce at Elkpoint, as such changes in the channel may occur before the general permanent improvement of the river is undertaken as to render the proposed works useless as a part of that plan, as the works will not in any case benefit navigation until included in an improvement of a long reach of river at least the distance between two important ports, and as the carrying out of a general plan for improvement in the interest of navigation can be far more economically and advantageously done if done continuously rather than by constructing isolated works and afterwards connecting them, it would appear that in instances of this kind such appropriations made for the protection of certain localities are not advisable and interfere with the general scheme for the improvement of the Missouri River in the interest of navigation.

* * * * * * *

The estimated cost of such an improvement extending downstream so far as to fully protect the town is $377,700, which is regarded as a greater expense than the ascertained value of property endangered would justify.

Mr. MAXWELL. I would like to ask the gentleman a question, with his consent?

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. MAXWELL. Is it not a fact that near this town there is a slough which extends for a long distance from the river——

Mr. BURTON (interrupting). I am not thoroughly familiar with the geographical situation there.

Mr. MAXWELL. I was only endeavoring to show to the gentleman that this is not a parallel case with Sioux City.

The gentleman must remember that these towns, Sioux City and South Sioux City, are below the Big Sioux River, which forms a current striking the bank at that point, and is now doing serious damage to property adjacent to the towns, and unless steps are taken promptly there is no knowing what the result will be at any time within the near future.

Mr. BURTON. I should like to yield to the gentleman, but my time is so limited that I think I must decline to yield further. I am not arguing about any specific place; but here, in a river and harbor act, we are asked to protect these different towns. Why, if this is for the protection of commerce, I would suggest that it go to some other committee or to some commission. The gentleman from Iowa [Mr. PERKINS] might introduce a resolution and have it referred to the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce. The chairman of that committee is his colleague from Iowa [Mr. HEPBURN], and if referred there, he no doubt would be in the hands of his friends. But when it comes to making appropriations here, and calling them river and harbor appropriations, where there is no commerce practically—less than 20,000 tons; where you are engaged in an impracticable scheme, when you seek to pick out for improvement places here and there on a great reach of 1,660 miles, I must enter my decided opposition to it. I trust this bill will receive the support of members of this House who believe in river and harbor appropriations, but who believe in making them effective for the purposes intended.

Mr. KELLEY. I ask unanimous consent for three minutes time.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota asks unanimous consent——

Mr. MAHANY. I should like to ask the gentleman from Ohio a question.

Mr. BURTON. I yield to the gentleman from New York for a question.

Mr. MAHANY. The gentleman speaks of a plan for the general improvement of the river. Can he forecast in any degree or approximate the time when this plan will probably go into operation?

Mr. BURTON. It will take many years and many millions; that is all, I think, anyone can say.

Mr. MAHANY. Then do you not think the temporary improvement would be valuable, and that it would not interfere with the general plan?

Mr. BURTON. The temporary improvement, as far as snagging is concerned, is provided for, but the point is, why pick out these places and make a harbor before you have any commerce?

Mr. Chairman, I move that debate on the pending paragraph be now closed.

Mr. KELLEY. I asked unanimous consent for three minutes, or two minutes, and my request is before the House.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] moves that debate on the paragragh and pending amendment be closed.

Mr. KELLEY. Mr. Chairman, my request was announced to the House.

Mr. BURTON. I had not yielded the floor.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from South Dakota submitted his request at a time when the gentleman from Ohio was still in possession of the floor, and before yielding the floor he made the motion which the Chair has submitted.

Mr. BURTON. If I may make my motion at the end of the gentleman's remarks, I am willing to yield to him three minutes——

Mr. KELLEY. Two minutes are all I ask for.

Mr. BURTON. But I think I should have the right to close the discussion.

The CHAIRMAN. Does the gentleman from Ohio yield to the gentleman from South Dakota?

Mr. BURTON. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from South Dakota may have three minutes, and at the close of that time I ask the Chair to recognize my motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request?

There was no objection.

Mr. KELLEY. I simply want to state to the members of the committee that the very courteous chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors has overlooked certain things in presenting this case. Work has already been commenced in three different places on the Missouri River, and above $40,000 has already been expended at the city of Pierre in building dikes to deflect the water and hold it in a certain channel. Over $40,000 has already been expended by the Government at the city of Yankton, and money has already been expended for the improvement of the river at the city of Elk Point. Now, the engineer who has this work in charge tells us that if more money is not appropriated to complete the work, the money already expended will be entirely lost; the dikes that have been built will be washed away and be absolutely of no value.

Further, I want to call the attention of members of the committee to the fact that in the first session of the Fifty-fifth Congress I myself introduced a bill in this House, and it passed by unanimous consent, for the purpose of quieting the title to certain lands situated on the Missouri River, where the action of the river had cut away a large portion of land and left a section of country in the State of South Dakota that was formerly in Nebraska.

I think we are entitled to some consideration at the hands of Congress as well as the people living in other sections of the country. It is to stimulate the commerce of the great Middle West as much as for the protection of the people who live along the banks of the Missouri River that we ask for this small appropriation in a bill that carries $30,000,000.

In spite of this large sum the committee do not seem to be able to find it in their hearts to grant to this great Middle West $300,000, while there is carried in this bill $24,000,000 for twelve States of the Union. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BISHOP], who interposed his objection a few minutes ago to my having five minutes, himself gets for his State $2,500,000 in this bill. Let us be just and fair with one another. We are all American citizens, and we appeal to your honor and your sense of fairness and justice. We ask you to take this measure fairly under advisement and as we are asking for nothing but what is right, we are sure you will grant it if you will only give the matter proper consideration.

The question being taken, the Chairman announced that the noes appeared to have it.

Mr. KELLEY demanded a division.

The committee divided; and there were—ayes 29, noes 78.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Sacramento River, California, from the city of Sacramento to the mouth: Continuing improvement, $30,000: Provided, That a contract or contracts may be entered into by the Secretary of War for such materials and work as may be necessary to carry out the revised project as recommended in House Document No. 186, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session, and House Document No. 44, Fifty-fifth Congress, third session, to be paid for as appropriations may from time to time be made by law, not to exceed in the aggregate the sum of $184,000, exclusive of amount herein and heretofore appropriated.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment, to correct a verbal error that has crept into the bill.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out in line 3, page 68, the words "Forty-four" and insert in lieu thereof "Forty-eight."

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the amendment will be adopted.

There was no objection.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving San Joaquin River, California: Continuing improvement, $20,000.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, in that paragraph in regard to San Joaquin River an amendment is needed, to make it more clear where the dredging and other work is to be done.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 9, page 68, after the word "dollars," the following:
"To be expended in dredging, making cut-offs, or otherwise improving said river and Stockton and Morgan channels to the city limits of the city of Stockton."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Improving Upper Coquille River, between Coquille City and Myrtlepoint, Oreg.: Continuing improvement, $5,000.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

In the remarks made by the chairman of the committee on yesterday he made this statement:

I trust the gentleman from Oregon, in giving figures by States, will not overlook the fact that in the appropriations last made for rivers and harbors the State of Oregon received approximately $3.50 for each inhabitant of the State, while the State of New York received only 25 cents.

Now, Mr. Chairman, if the State of Oregon received that amount of money two years ago, while now half a million more is being taken away than is appropriated, it would indicate the difference in treatment proposed appropriations receive when the State interested is represented on the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and when it is not. It is hardly fair to assume that Oregon was entitled to that much appropriation at that time, and entitled to have the same appropriations taken from it now.

But this statement, Mr. Chairman, requires considerable explanation, and I shall be glad to see the gentleman give an extended statement as to just what these appropriations consist of. I have tried to look over the law of 1896, and have done the best I could to see how large appropriations were made, and find the appropriations on rivers and harbors by the bill of 1896 for Oregon alone was $225,000. There was an appropriation for Columbia River, which is on the boundary line between Oregon and Washington and extends also toward Idaho. It is not fair that the State of Oregon should be charged for more than half of that. Then, charging half of it to Oregon, there were appropriated $302 500.

There was authority to give contracts, it is true, but of these contracts only $60,000 have been approved and are in operation, making a total of $362,500 of the appropriations available under that bill. As there are about 500,000 inhabitants in Oregon, it is an appropriation of about 70 cents per capita, and the appropriation as compared with New York would be nearly or about the same. It is true that there were some appropriations for contracts; but this bill proposes to repeal those appropriations and repeal those contracts, so that instead of being charged with $3.50 we should only be charged with about 70 cents per capita.

But, Mr. Chairman, I want rather to insist that the appropriation ought not to be distributed in a certain per capita way. If so, there are States that receive nothing. These appropriations should be made something in proportion to the needs of the localities. New States have to build new public buildings. They have to build new schoolhouses, new court-houses, and new public buildings of every kind, and new roads, and have to appropriate the money for opening up their own channels of commerce. You can not build up a new State for nothing, and a new State should not be treated in the same manner in appropriations as the old States. They are expenditures for opening up commerce, and it can be done best in the new States.

The gentleman raised the comparison with New York. I do not want to raise any criticism of any appropriation for anything in New York, but when you compare the question of expenditure of public money in New York and the Western States there is no comparison. We pay our taxes as they do. We pay internal-revenue taxes of about a million dollars, beside taxes on imports, and we can not, therefore, act on percentages, as a rule, in appropriating money for the improvements of rivers and harbors. There are no great public buildings there; there are no great contracts there; there are no people getting great contracts for supplies to the Government there, and money is not expended except when the Government improves a river or harbor.

Now, of the millions of dollars that Oregon will pay into the public Treasury but little will come back. There is $140,000 in this bill, practically. Then there are some appropriations for the Indians, but the lands sold by the Government will recoup that. The Government is selling land constantly and putting the money in the Treasury, and that does not come back to Oregon. The people who gave Oregon to the United States and enabled it to sell these lands have no benefit of it. The men who took their packs upon their backs and saddled up their horses and took their rifles and shotguns and drove out the public enemies from that Territory have not received the benefit of it. They have been begging here for years for small pensions, and, notwithstanding they are getting to the age of 70 or 80 years, they have received nothing. It does not seem to me that the State of Oregon has been a charge upon the public Government, and it is entitled to consideration as one of the States of the Union.

Mr. BURTON. I do not intend to take up the time of the committee long with these figures. The figures I gave to the House yesterday were correct. In making the computation, I followed the quasi-official estimate book made up at the War Department. In the column of last appropriations, according to the titles given in this book, Oregon received in the last appropriation $1,281,167.

Mr. TONGUE. Read the items.

Mr. BURTON. I do not think I ought to take the time of the House, but I will read a few of them:

Coos Bay	$95,000
Yaquina Bay	25,000
Tellamook Bay	17,000
Harbor at Coos Bay	14,300
Columbia River at Three-Mile Rapids and boat railway from The Dalles Rapids to Celilo Falls	150,000
Coos River	5,000
Alsea River	3,000
Nestugga River	6,000
Columbia River at the Cascades	179,597
Mouth of Columbia River	338,180
Lower Willamette and Columbia rivers	100,000
Willamette River above Portland	160,000

And so forth.

Now, it is true some of these are on the boundary line between Oregon and Washington, but they are regarded as distinctly Oregon improvements and are so classified in the official estimates.

Mr. TONGUE. What is the total amount?

Mr. BURTON. One million two hundred and eighty-one thousand one hundred and sixty-seven dollars, as against $1,895,910.56 for the State of New York. The average for the State of Oregon is $3.57 per inhabitant. I said approximately $3.50. The computation is according to the population of 1890, which was 313,767. For the State of New York it was 31.6 cents per inhabitant. The actual amounts appropriated in 1896 for expenditure during the following year show that Oregon received $839,726 in that bill, or $2.64 per inhabitant, while New York received $934,650, or 16.6 cents. I think the gentleman will find, on verification of these figures, that they are exactly correct.

Mr. TONGUE. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last two words. The gentleman has read the figures and makes a total of $1,281,167, charging to Oregon all of the Columbia River. Now, he has forgotten to tell you that this bill proposes to repeal $1,170,000 of that, leaving practically what I said was to be expended—about 70 cents per capita.

Mr. BURTON. I know the gentleman from Oregon does not wish to make a misstatement. Allow me to call his attention to the fact that the $1,000,000 repealed is not included in the totals that I gave. That was authorized under continuing contract and may be regarded as a reserve fund additional to the $1,287,000.

Mr. TONGUE. Then the gentleman or I can not figure. The appropriations will not make one-half of the amount. I have examined the statutes, and I say to the House that the appropriations will not make one-half of the figures given by the gentleman from Ohio. I want to say further that the figures for New York are as inaccurate as those for Oregon. The appropriations for New York actually carried in that bill for rivers and harbors amounted to $1,182,000, while the contracts authorized were $2,649,558, or a total of $3,831,558. I do not begrudge New York one cent of it. Mr. Chairman, I withdraw my formal amendment.

The Clerk, proceeding with the reading of the bill, read as follows:

Appropriations made for the respective works herein named, or so much thereof as may be necessary, may, in the discretion of the Secretary of War, be used for the repair and restoration of said works whenever from any cause they have become seriously impaired, as well as for the further improvement of said works.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, at the completion of the reading of section 1, I ask unanimous consent to return to the item on page 12 pertaining to Brunswick, Ga., as I desire to offer an amendment, which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out, beginning with line 5, on page 12, all to and including line 13, page 14, and insert the following:

"Improving the outer bar, Brunswick, Ga.: C. P. Goodyear, the contractor with the Government of the United States to deepen the outer bar of Brunswick, Ga., under the river and harbor acts of 1894 and 1896, shall be entitled to receive the sums appropriated by said acts for obtaining a channel 24 feet deep and 200 feet wide and a channel 25 feet deep and 100 feet wide, provided the same are obtained on or before June 3, 1900; and said acts are hereby amended accordingly. After the expiration of the time herein stated within which said work of improvement must be obtained, the Secretary of War shall cause a survey of the same to be made and report a plan, with estimate of the cost thereof, with a view to obtaining a depth of 26 feet at mean high tide with a width of 200 feet; and the sum of $5,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated to defray the cost of making said survey and estimate based thereon.

"Improving inner harbor at Brunswick, Ga.: For maintenance, $10,000."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, a word of explanation. Some years ago the Government engineer made an estimate that it would require to obtain 26 feet over the bar here $2,700,000. Mr. C. P. Goodyear, a New England man, thought that by the use of dynamite he could obtain a channel at a place different from the one selected by the Government engineers at a less cost, and in the acts of 1894 and 1896 provision was made that he should receive certain compensation provided he obtained a channel of certain depths and widths. He has earned the compensation promised him except $90,000, the opportunity to earn which is by the provisions of this bill extended one year. The remaining $320,000, which by the terms of this bill he was to receive, provided certain results should be obtained, is stricken out.

The committee felt somewhat doubtful, notwithstanding the great economy in securing the results accomplished by Mr. Goodyear, whether the dredging which he had done could not be done as economically, or more economically, by the Government. His claim has been that by the use of dynamite a channel was secured which would be more permanent than one made by dredging in the ordinary way. Some question existed in the minds of members of the committee who had considered the subject whether this claim is a valid one; and in order that we may be absolutely on the safe side, it seemed best for us merely to modify the existing appropriations by giving an additional year.

It is but just to Mr. Goodyear that this should be done, because he asserts that he has already secured the depth which would entitle him to $90,000; and in every case where a measurement has been made he has been compelled to wait a long time for a report. There was once a bitter controversy between him and the Government engineers as to what was the correct measurement; and we regard it as due to him that he should have this additional time. But the remaining provisions for further appropriation are absolutely eliminated from the bill, but there is added a clause providing that when the depth already provided for is secured by him—24 by 200 feet and 25 by 100—a survey shall be made with a view to obtaining a depth of 26 feet across the bar, and an estimate of the cost is to be made.

I can not close without saying that this port is one of those whose growth and importance have impressed us; and we regard it as one that is certainly deserving of improvement as proposed.

The question being taken, the amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 3. That the provisions of the river and harbor act of 1894 for a boat railway from the foot of The Dalles Rapids to the head of Celilo Falls, Oregon and Washington, and the provisions of the river and harbor act of 1896 providing for the improvement of Yaquina Bay, Oregon, and all acts for the prosecution of either of said projects are hereby repealed, and any amounts heretofore appropriated for either of the same now remaining unexpended shall be paid into the Treasury of the United States.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I should like to have the attention of the chairman of the committee for a moment.

Mr. BURTON. What is the gentleman's point?

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I wish to ask the gentleman whether he will be kind enough to state the reasons of the committee for reporting in this section a clause repealing the provision heretofore made for a boat railway from the foot of The Dalles Rapids to the head of Celilo Falls, Oregon and Washington?

Mr. BURTON. The committee regarded this project, I may say, as very doubtful, if not absolutely impracticable, from an engineering standpoint. Besides, it would require, if constructed, at least $100,000 a year to maintain it. The expense of maintenance would be very largely increased by the drifting of sand across the track. I have no doubt the gentleman from Washington understands what the plan is—that it is to take a boat out of water and carry it on a railway up a considerable grade to a point some miles above—that is, from The Dalles Rapids to the head of Celilo Falls.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. To make a ship railway.

Mr. BURTON. Yes; to make a ship railway. This project has never been recommended by the engineers; they do not believe in it now. The proposed plan has given rise to a great deal of discussion in engineering journals here and in Europe. Engineering authorities would like to see the project tried, but most of them do not think it would succeed; and the cost of this work would be about two million and a half of dollars. The committee thought that too large a sum to spend upon an experiment.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the kindness of the chairman of the committee in giving us this very intelligent explanation. I would for some reasons have been desirous for the continuance of this appropriation; but I realize that we must display some deference to the recommendations of some of the Departments; and as the War Department after investigation has not thought proper to concur with the views of those interested, I do not think I should be justified in urging this appropriation further, although some of my constituents request that I should do so. I have only risen in my place to demonstrate publicly the interest that I feel in the matter and to say that the information of the honorable chairman verifies what has been stated to me at the Department.

I have serious doubts as to the practicability of the scheme and some doubt as to the virtue of the project, notwithstanding the good intentions of some of those behind it. While I would like to favor a certain class of my constituents who ask me to advocate this project, yet with the scruples which I have I can not ask the committee to do other than what it has done in this bill. I wish to make myself perfectly plain. While personally I would like that the class of my constituents interested in this adventure should be personally benefited and profited, I do not think I should be justified in asking the House to combat the position of the committee, in view of what has been stated by the honorable chairman.

The Clerk read as follows:

SEC. 8. That the Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause preliminary examinations or surveys to be made at the localities named in this section as hereinafter provided. In all cases a preliminary examination shall first be made, which shall embrace information concerning the commercial importance, present and prospective, of the river or harbor mentioned, and a report as to the advisability of its improvement. Whenever such preliminary examination has been made, in case such improvement is not deemed advisable, no further action shall be taken thereon without the direction of Congress; but in case the report has been or shall be to the effect that such river or harbor is worthy of improvement, the Secretary of War is hereby directed, at his discretion, to cause surveys to be made and the cost of improving such river or harbor to be estimated and to be reported to Congress, to wit:

CALIFORNIA.

Napa River.
Sonoma Creek.
Suisun Creek.
Crescent Bay.

Mr. BARLOW. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert between lines 21 and 22, page 75, after the words "Crescent Bay," the following:

"Wilmington Harbor, California, with a view of increasing the depth of said harbor to 25 and 30 feet at mean low water over the area proposed to be improved in the project set forth in the report of Lieut. Col. W. H. H. Benyaurd of June 8, 1894, and contained in Senate Executive Document No 61, Fifty-third Congress, third session, and over an additional area extending to Smith Island, and of adequate width to allow the turning of vessels."

Mr. BARLOW. Mr. Chairman, this is simply the exact provision contained in the river and harbor appropriation bill for 1896. It provides for the survey of this harbor, so that when the Government of the United States in its wisdom sees fit to improve—as, no doubt, it will in time—the inner harbor in connection with the outer harbor we will have the data on which to proceed.

I hope no objection will be made.

This bill provides a number of surveys at four or five other points in California which, if I may be permitted to say so, are of comparatively small importance in connection with this harbor. I only ask that the survey shall be made, so that the data may be on hand when the work is undertaken.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I do not feel like vigorously opposing the proposition of my friend from California, yet I do not think it is necessary at this time to make this survey. We have made provision in the bill for all of the surveys that we deemed were necessary; and to enlarge the number will certainly require a much larger force of engineers than the United States has at present in its employ. If the work is placed upon the present force, they will be largely overtaxed.

I hope the amendment will not be adopted, therefore.

Another point why it should not be adopted is, I would suggest, that it will be some three years yet before the outer harbor is completed, and there will be ample time to make provision for the inner harbor when that work is done. I therefore suggest that, while I do not like to make opposition to the amendment, I hope it will not be agreed to by the committee, because it is not necessary at the present time.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BURTON) there were—ayes 28, noes 66.

So the amendment was rejected.

The Clerk read as follows:

Channel between the straits of Carquinez and the Golden Gate, off Point Pinol, Point Wilson, and Lone Tree Point, with a view to obtaining a channel 300 feet in width, of a depth of 30 feet.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer an amendment at this point.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 25, page 75, a new paragraph, as follows:
"Connecticut—Milliford Harbor."

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MARYLAND.

Claibourne Harbor.
Queenstown Harbor.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I wish at this point to offer an amendment on behalf of the committee.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert after line 20, page 78, following the word "harbor," the words:
"Patuxent River at Bristol Bar, Brittons Bay, on the Potomac River."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

MASSACHUSETTS.

Chatham Harbor: With the view of ascertaining what further expenditure is necessary to complete existing project of removing the bar which obstructs navigation up to the New Bedford and Fairhaven Bridge.

Mr. BURTON. I offer the following amendment, Mr. Chairman:

The Clerk read as follows:

Strike out lines 23, 24, and 25, on page 78, and insert:
"New Bedford Harbor: To remove the bar between the present channel and the northerly terminus of the proposed channel on the northerly side of the New Bedford and Fairhaven Bridge."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Winthrop Harbor: To provide channels of a width of 75 and 100 feet, respectively, and a depth of 12 feet.

Mr. FITZGERALD. Mr. Chairman, I move the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 8, page 79, after the word "feet," the words "and 15 feet."

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I see no objection to the amendment and shall make no opposition to it.

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Channel of Assonet River.
Beverly Harbor.
Cottage City.
Westport Point Harbor.
Sandwich Harbor.
Bass River Harbor.
Cotuit Harbor.
Harbor at Hyannisport.

Mr. BURTON. I move to amend by striking out, in line 16, page 79, the words "Harbor at Hyannisport" and insert in lieu thereof the word "Hyannis."

The amendment was considered and agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Channel from Lake Michigan to Stoney Lake, Oceana County.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, another committee amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

In line 23, page 79, after the word "County," insert the following:
"Cheboygan Harbor: To obtain a depth of 18 feet from the entrance of said harbor to the first bridge."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

St. Croix River, from Stillwater Harbor to Taylors Falls, Minn., with a view to making said river accessible to steamboats and other craft navigating said river.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to offer an amendment to that paragraph.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert in line 10, page 80, after the word "river," the following:
"Minnesota River, with a view to protecting the banks thereof at and near St. Peter, in Nicollet County."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Missouri River: With a view to prevent the erosion of the north bank thereof at and near Huntsdale, in Boone County, Mo.

Mr. COWHERD. I wish to offer an amendment.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Insert after line 21, page 80, after the word "Missouri," the following:
"With a view to prevent the erosion of the south bank thereof and the cutting of a new channel at or near the city of Napoleon, in Lafayette County, Mo."

Mr. BURTON. I should like to have that amendment explained. Does this enlarge the territory over which the examination is to be made?

Mr. COWHERD. No, sir; this is a request for a survey at a point in Lafayette County, Mo., near the little town of Napoleon. I will explain that there is a bend in the river at that point, and that about 6,000 acres of very fertile land are connected with the mainland by a small neck. The river is cutting in at this neck, and there is a lake in there—I do not know how many acres in extent, but quite a large body of water—a shallow lake. The danger is that unless the erosion is stopped, when the water reaches that lake, it will cut through and form a new channel. I do not ask for any appropriation. I understand that a large part of the appropriation for the Missouri has been diverted, or possibly will be; but I wish this put in the bill to call the attention of the Missouri River Commission to the danger at that point, in order that if, upon examination, they find it necessary, they will make the repair out of the continuing improvement fund in their hands. It will cost practically nothing, I suppose.

Mr. BURTON. I see no objection to this being inserted, but I do want to say for myself, not assuming to speak for the remainder of the committee, that I am decidedly opposed to this custom which has prevailed for so many years, of providing for the protection of private property, or public property either, on navigable streams, and calling it river and harbor improvement. As to whether that shall be undertaken by the General Government or not, I do not pretend to say; but as to the propriety of bringing it in here on a river where there is no navigation, and asking us to prevent the banks from being washed away or lands overflowed, I have decided views. If this were a new proposition, I should feel in duty bound to oppose it. However, as there are other similar items in the bill, I do not see that we can justly object.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

NEW JERSEY.

Raccoon Creek.
Woodbridge Creek.
Kill van Kull.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to offer an amendment as a substitute there.

The amendment was read, as follows:

Strike out the words "Kill van Kull" in line 25, page 80, and insert the following:
"Arthur Kill, or Staten Island Sound, from Kill van Kull to Raritan Bay, with a view to obtaining of a 21-foot channel by way of Staten Island Sound from New York Bay to Raritan Bay."

The amendement was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Passaic River: With the view of ascertaining the cost and feasibility of extending a 10-foot channel of suitable width from Center street bridge to the Montclair Railway Bridge, and also as to the feasibility and cost of affording a channel 12 feet in depth from Center street bridge to Staten Island Sound. Also an examination of said river from Montclair Railway Bridge to the city of Paterson.

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Chairman, without wanting to antagonize the section referring to the Passaic River, it seems to me proper at this time to put in the RECORD the fact that Jersey City and other municipalities in Hudson County have a right to use the water of that river for domestic and other purposes. I say this in order that the engineers, in considering the feasibility of making that stream navigable, shall have the information that these municipalities have contracts whereby they are entitled to a water supply from the Passaic River for the use of these cities. These rights were granted by charter by the legislature of the State of New Jersey, are valuable, and if their value is in any way impaired of course compensation would be asked. The engineers ought to consider this in making any estimates of the cost of rendering the river navigable.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

The committee informally rose; and Mr. LOUDENSLAGER having taken the chair as Speaker pro tempore, a message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that that body had insisted upon its amendments to the bill (H. R. 11487) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, disagreed to by the House of Representatives, had agreed to the conference asked by the House on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses thereon, and had appointed Mr. HALE, Mr. PERKINS, and Mr. FAULKNER as the conferees on the part of the Senate.

RIVER AND HARBOR APPROPRIATION BILL.

The committee resumed its session.

The Clerk read as follows:

The canal and locks situated on the west side of the Willamette River, at Willamette Falls, in Clackamas County: With a view to ascertaining the desirability of their condemnation and purchase by the United States.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, I desire to offer the following amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert in line 12, page 72, after the word "United States," the following:

"PENNSYLVANIA.

"Youghiogheny River, with a view to the improvement of said river by locks and dams from West Newton to the mouth of said river, at McKeesport, Pa."

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Chairman, this involves the Youghiogheny improvement for a distance of 20 miles on that river which was navigated for a period of twenty-five years prior to 1866, rendered so by a system of locks and dams built by the Youghiogheny Navigation Company. These dams were taken away in 1866 and not since rebuilt. Now, since the Ohio and the Monongahela improvement has been made public, owned by the United States and made free, it is only contemplated to survey this river and ascertain under this bill whether it is necessary and proper to improve this river, to replace improvements which were very profitable from the beginning when in the hands of a private corporation. This amendment commits the Government to no expense.

The matter was considered by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I have spoken to the chairman, and I understand there is no objection to having a preliminary examination made. This is a most meritorious case, and I urge its adoption most earnestly. The whole matter was so fully explained by me before the River and Harbor Committee that it is unnecessary now to longer consume the time of the committee.

Mr. BURTON. I will say, Mr. Chairman, that I have no objection to the insertion of the amendment, and I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania may be recognized.

Mr. GRAHAM. Mr. Chairman, some criticism has been made as to the large amount appropriated in this bill for the improvement of the Monongahela, Allegheny, and Ohio rivers, including this improvement suggested by the amendment of my colleague, it being considered rather out of proportion to the amount appropriated for other sections of the country. Having the honor to represent a portion of the district affected, a section of Allegheny county adjacent to Pittsburg, I desire to call the attention of the House to the importance of this portion of our great country, and I state, without fear of successful contradiction, that this is the center of the greatest hive of human industry on the face of the earth, as I will demonstrate by the following statistics collated from State and national bureaus. To impress these facts more forcibly, I have put them into comparative form.

Pittsburg is the center of greatest population in the United States outside of New York and Philadelphia. Within a radius of 60 miles around Pittsburg reside, according to the last census, 1,608,964 people, a greater population than Chicago and a similar radius.

The capital, surplus, and deposits of the banks, national, State, and savings, of this one county exceed the combined banking capital, surplus, and deposits of eight Southern States.

The tax valuation of property in the county is $490,000,000. Real estate exempted from taxation, sixty-four millions.

Of the following products made in the United States Allegheny county produces:

	Per cent.		Per cent.
Steel	47	Harness leather	50
Steel rails	56	Bituminous coal mined	25
Plate glass	75	Paper sacks	33
Pig iron	27	Wrought iron and steel pipe	75
Window glass	40	Nails and spikes	25
Table glassware	50

Has 2,483 mills and manufacturing establishments, with a capital of over $200,000,000; value of annual products, $244,535,875; paying out in wages over $60,000,000 annually.

Has 63 blast furnaces and rolling mills, employing 82,000 workers. Also over 250 miles electric street railway, with combined capital of $54,000,000. One thousand miles of iron pipe is used in conveying natural gas to the manufactories and dwellings.

Pittsburg stands sixth among the cities of the United States in comparative volume of bank exchanges.

Pittsburg coke district produces 65 per cent of the entire output of coke in the United States; Pittsburg oil district produces 60 per cent of the entire output of oil in the United States.

The daily output of coke, if loaded on one train, would be 10 miles long, and yet, notwithstanding this immense product, surveys show 75,000 acres of coking coal yet untouched in this section.

The above figures only show a few of the leading industries that far surpass those of other sections, but in addition there are hundreds of other lines of manufacture which I have not the time to dwell upon.

While Pittsburg is famous the world over as the manufacturer of the most unyielding products of man's labor, namely, iron and steel, yet it stands first in the manufacture of glass, that most brittle and perishable article of trade.

Pittsburg can present annually to every man, woman, and child in this country a glass bottle. [Laughter.] It leaves to them to decide whether it shall be filled with milk or something stronger. [Laughter.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GRAHAM. I would like to ask for a few moments more.

Mr. BROSIUS. I ask unanimous consent that my colleague have five minutes more.

Mr. GRAHAM. Three minutes will be sufficient.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Pennsylvania that his colleague be allowed five minutes more? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRAHAM. I can give you a pointer that she sends out with the bottles 20,000,000 glass tumblers annually. And while I do not claim that Pittsburg leads the country in the manufacture of rye whisky and beer, she makes enough of both beer and whisky to fill all the tumblers she sends out, her most recent product being a $25,000,000 beer syndicate.

Now, to provide for other cravings of the stomach she has the "Heinz" firm, which sends out pickles enough to present every human being on the face of the earth with one. Of course, she manufactures corks enough to safely preserve the contents of all her bottles. [Laughter.]

One point which I wish to bring out is the fact that the tonnage, river and rail, of Pittsburg exceeds the river and rail tonnage of any other city in the known world. The river and rail tonnage of Pittsburg will amount to one-half as much as the combined commerce of the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Now, that is a startling statement, but is true nevertheless. If you take the entire commerce of New York, Baltimore, Boston, and the Pacific coast, the tonnage of all the vessels entering and leaving those ports will only exceed the tonnage of Pittsburg by one-half.

She has a railroad and river tonnage greater than any other city in the world. Her railroad tonnage is three times that of New York or Chicago, twice that of London, and four times that of Paris. [Applause.] Imagine a railroad tonnage in excess of the combined rail tonnage of New York, Chicago, and Boston. Two hundred and fifty passenger trains enter and depart daily from Pittsburg. Five thousand loaded railroad cars enter and depart daily. Including the Connellsville coke region, over 2,000,000 railroad cars are loaded annually.

Mr. BRUCKER. What town is that?

Mr. GRAHAM. It needs some gentleman on the floor of this House to ask that question, for it is known throughout the world. [Laughter and applause.] I want to say to the gentleman from the South——

Mr. GRIGGS. I object to that. The gentleman from Michigan [Mr. BRUCKER] lives farther north than the gentleman from Pennsylvania. [Laughter.]

Mr. GRAHAM (continuing). That the trade of a single firm in that city in iron ore, limestone, fuel, and finished product amounts to a greater tonnage than the combined cotton product of the entire Southern States. [Laughter and applause.]

Allegheny County consumes during the winter months over 1,000,000 cubic feet of natural gas per day. This is a greater consumption than at any previous time since the discovery of natural gas, and certainly does not indicate that the supply is becoming exhausted.

It reads like a paradox, that Pittsburg, known as the iron city, and making more iron than any other city on the globe, has no iron ore mined within 250 miles of its borders, the rough material being transported mainly from northern Michigan, it being found cheaper to transport the ore to the fuel than to bring the fuel to the ore.

Now, here is something that will perhaps interest gentlemen as to the revenue received by the United States from this section. The report of the Commissioner of Internal Revenue shows that of the 114 revenue districts in the United States there are only 7 which exceed this, the twenty-third district of Pennsylvania, in gross receipts, the returns for the last six months being $4,209,233.95, indicating an annual income of $10,000,000 from this district. [Applause.]

Now, for comparison with the world. Pittsburg contains the largest Bessemer steel plant in the world. It contains the largest crucible steel plant in the world. It contains the largest plate-glass plant in the world. It includes the largest chimney-glass plant in the world. She manufactures enough glass chimneys to break three or four in every family every day. It includes the largest table glassware plant in the world. It includes the largest air-brake plant in the world. It includes the largest steel-rail plant in the world. It includes the largest pickle works in the world. [Laughter and applause.] It includes the largest cork works in the world. It includes the largest tube and pipe works in the world. It includes the largest steel freight-car works in the world, and includes the largest coffee-roasting establishment in the world. Gentlemen, if I had time I could tell you hundreds of other things that Pittsburg contains. [Laughter and applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the amendment offered by the gentleman from Pennsylvania.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. ROBBINS) there were—ayes 106, noes 1.

So the amendment was agreed to.

Mr. KELLEY. I am well pleased that the combination is broken.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, it must be apparent to the House that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. GRAHAM] had but just entered upon the strong points of Pittsburg, and that he did not anywhere near complete his statement on account of the confusion in the House, and I ask unanimous consent that he may be allowed to extend his remarks in the RECORD, so as to do justice to that city. [Laughter.]

Mr. JOHNSON of Indiana. I suggest that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. DALZELL] may want to be heard on that subject. [Laughter.]

Mr. BURTON and Mr. MOON rose.

Mr. BURTON. I desire to offer an amendment; perhaps it is the same for which the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. MOON] is seeking the floor. Does the gentleman from Tennessee propose to offer an amendment for the survey of the Hiawassee River from its mouth to the mouth of the Okoee?

Mr. MOON. Yes, sir; that is the amendment I desired to offer.

Mr. BURTON. That is the amendment I am about to present on behalf of the committee and which I now send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Insert, in line 22, page 83, after the word "ford," the following:
"Hiawassee River: For its survey from its mouth to the mouth of the Okoee."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I rise to a parliamentary inquiry.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. I wish to ask whether it has been ruled by the Chair that unanimous consent is required in order to enable us to go back to a part of the bill that has been already passed.

The CHAIRMAN. It is the rule that where a paragraph has been reached in regular order and passed, it can not be gone back to except by unanimous consent.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Then, with the indulgence of the Chair, I wish while on my feet to propound an inquiry to the chairman of the committee [Mr. BURTON]. I have just received a telegram about the project known as the Seattle waterway, or ship canal——

Mr. BURTON. Between Lake Union and Lake Washington?

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Yes, sir. I should be very grateful if the chairman of the committee in his own time would state to the House, so that it may go on record, why the Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not see proper at this time to report an appropriation for that purpose. That statement of those reasons has been made to me in private conversation, but I would like to have a public statement, so as to relieve me of the necessity of bringing the proposition to the attention of the House.

Mr. BURTON. By the consent of the Committee of the Whole, I will say to the gentleman that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not regard that project as of sufficient importance to navigation to warrant us in including it in this bill. We regarded such an improvement as is proposed here as possibly desirable for the use of the Navy, but we did not think it should find a place in the pending measure. We regarded the project as one to be adopted not by us, but by the Committee on Naval Affairs. Arguments both for and against the project were presented to us, and those against it seemed to have the greater weight.

Mr. LEWIS of Washington. Allow me to ask my friend whether it was the general opinion of the committee that the project, if available or expedient, should fall under the jurisdiction of the Naval Committee rather than the Committee on Rivers and Harbors?

Mr. BURTON. Yes; if any such improvement is to be made at all.

The Clerk read as follows:

TEXAS.

Harbor at Alligator Head, in Matagorda Bay, and the harbor at Brazos Santiago, off Point Isabel, Texas, with plans and estimates for the removal of the bars at said harbors to furnish an inlet to each of said harbors to permit ocean-going vessels to enter said harbors with necessary depths of channel.

Mr. BURTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the paragraph just read insert the following:
"From Galveston jetties to Texas City, with a view to obtaining a depth of 25 feet and a bottom width of 100 feet."

Mr. HAWLEY. To this amendment I desire to offer an amendment which seems to me more comprehensive. I ask the Clerk to read it.

The Clerk read as follows:

The Secretary of War is hereby directed to cause an examination and such survey as may be necessary to be made to determine the feasibility and cost of dredging a channel from Galveston Harbor to Texas City, Tex., the same to be 100 feet wide at the bottom and 25 feet deep between the points above named, and advisability of said improvement, and report the same to Congress as soon as practicable.

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY] will allow me to say to him that a general provision at the beginning of section 8 covers all matters of this kind. We have not repeated the verbiage in connection with each separate project, harbor, or channel. I refer the gentleman to page 75 of the bill.

Mr. HAWLEY. I withdraw my amendment, because it is covered under section 8, to which the gentleman from Ohio has referred.

The Clerk read as follows:

To remove bar at the mouth of Jacksons Creek, in Middlesex County.

Mr. BURTON. I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Add after the paragraph just read the following:
"James River, with a view of ascertaining what expenditure will be necessary to continue improvement to the head of navigation at the Docks."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Harbor at Port Washington: With a view of obtaining a channel 15 feet in depth, by extending piers 300 feet and of protecting the same by a breakwater, or otherwise.

Mr. BURTON. I move to amend by striking out the word "by," in line 8, and inserting the words "and of;" so as to read:

With a view of obtaining a channel 15 feet in depth, and of extending piers, etc.

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. BURTON. My attention has been called to the necessity of a verbal amendment on page 81. I ask unanimous consent that we return to the item embraced in lines 15 and 16 of that page.

There was no objection.

Mr. BURTON. I move to amend by striking out after the word "Dunkirk" the words "preliminary examination as to necessity for" and inserting "survey for easterly;" so as to read:

Dunkirk: Survey for easterly breakwater.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Chairman, I move that the committee now rise and report the bill to the House with the amendments adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HOPKINS reported that the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, having had under consideration the river and harbor bill, had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and as so amended that the bill do pass.

The amendments recommended by the committee were considered, and agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time.

The question recurred on the passage of the bill.

Mr. MAXWELL. Mr. Speaker, on that question I demand the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were not ordered.

The question was taken on the passage of the bill; and on a division (demanded by Mr. HEPBURN) there were—ayes 160, noes 7.

So the bill was passed.

On motion of Mr. BURTON, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

EULOGIES ON THE LATE REPRESENTATIVE DINGLEY.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution I send to the desk.

The SPEAKER. The resolution will be read, after which the Chair will ask if there be objection.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That Saturday, February 11, 1899, be set apart for the purpose of paying tribute to the memory of Hon. NELSON DINGLEY, late a member of the House of Representatives from the State of Maine.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution?

There being no objection, the resolution was considered, and agreed to.

EXTENSION OF RHODE ISLAND AVENUE.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. Mr. Speaker, I desire to submit at this time for consideration a conference report.

In view of the fact that this report has been before the House and already read, I ask unanimous consent that its reading now be dispensed with and that the statement of the conferees be read instead.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Iowa?

There was no objection.

The statement of the House conferees was read, as follows:

The bill as it passed the Senate carried an appropriation of $75,000 for extending Rhode Island avenue; half of which sum was payable out of the Treasury of the United States and half out of the revenues of the District of Columbia.

The House struck out the appropriation and provided for condemnation proceedings, with a thousand dollars to pay the cost of such proceedings.

The conference reports in favor of dividing the cost of the land to be acquired for extending Rhode Island avenue between the persons whose property was to be benefited by the extension and the revenues of the District of Columbia.

This is in accordance with the position that the House has taken for the past five years in relation to extension of streets in the District of Columbia beyond the city of Washington.

G. M. CURTIS,
W. S. COWHERD,
Conferees on the part of the House.

Mr. CURTIS of Iowa. I move the adoption of the conference report.

The report was considered, and agreed to.

GAUGING, ETC., OF SPIRITS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration in the House of the bill (H. R. 10997) to amend section 3287 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, concerning the drawing off, gauging, marking, and removal of spirits.

I ask that the Committee of the Whole be discharged and that the bill be now taken up for consideration.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That section 3287 of the Revised Statutes of the United States, as amended by section 6 of the act approved May 28, 1880, entitled "An act to amend the laws in relation to internal revenue," be amended by adding at the end thereof the following:

"Provided, however, That the Commissioner of Internal Revenue be authorized, upon application of the distiller, to allow any package or cases, or packages encasing not less than two tins. Said packages or cases, or packages encasing tins to be of not less capacity than 10 gallons, wine measure, to be filled with distilled spirits from the receiving cisterns in such manner as said Commissioner may by regulation prescribe for the purpose of exportation from the United States. And there shall be charged for each of said packages or cases for the expense of providing and affixing stamps, 5 cents instead of 10 cents as now required by law."

The Committee on Ways and Means recommended the adoption of the following amendments:

Strike out lines 9, 10, 11, 12, and 13 on page 1, and lines 1, 2, and 3 on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following:

"Provided, however, That upon the application of the distiller, and under such regulations as the Commissioner of Internal Revenue, with the approval of the Secretary of the Treasury, may prescribe, distilled spirits may be drawn into wooden packages, each containing two or more metallic cans, which cans shall have each a capacity of not less than 5 gallons, wine measure, such packages to be filled and used only for exportation from the United States."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

There was no objection.

The amendment recommended by the committee was agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. PAYNE, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

WILLIAM H. HUGO.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (S. 1032) for the relief of William H. Hugo.

The SPEAKER. The bill will be read, subject to the right of objection.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the laws regulating appointments in the Army of the United States be, and they are hereby, suspended for the purposes of this bill, and that, in view of his services to his country, the President is hereby authorized to nominate and, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, to appoint William H. Hugo, now of Fort Bayard, N. Mex., a first lieutenant of cavalry in the Army of the United States, and thereupon to place him on the retired list of the Army with the pay and emoluments of a retired officer with the rank of a first lieutenant, without regard and in addition to the retired list now authorized by law.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. McEWAN. Mr. Speaker, I reserve the right to object until this bill has been explained.

Mr. HAY. I ask that the report be read, Mr. Speaker, which fully sets forth the purposes of the bill.

Mr. BAILEY. Is this party in the service now?

Mr. HAY. He is not.

Mr. BAILEY. Then I do not think——

Mr. HAY. I hope the gentleman will wait and allow the report to be read.

Mr. BAILEY. Certainly.

The SPEAKER. The report will be read.

The report (by Mr. McDONALD) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Military Affairs, to which Senate bill No. 1093 was referred, the same having passed the Senate January 23, 1898, return the same with the recommendation that the bill do pass, incorporating as part of their report the report of the Senate, as follows:

[Senate Report No. 477, Fifty-fifth Congress, second session.]

The Committee on Military Affairs, having considered the bill (S. 1093) for the relief of William H. Hugo, respectfully recommend that the bill do pass.

A report in favor of this bill was made in the House of Representatives on the 28th day of March, 1892, and reports were twice made in the Senate in favor of this bill—first July 12, 1894, and again on February 11, 1897. Each one of these reports contains an elaborate statement of the facts, with copies of records and papers.

These records and papers have been carefully considered. They show that William H. Hugo was a captain of volunteers in the Army of the United States in June, 1861. He served faithfully and gallantly until the end of the war. He was severely wounded, and on another occasion he lost entirely the use of one ear. His record in that war was without a single blemish. He was twice promoted for gallant conduct in that war.

When the Volunteer Army was disbanded Mr. Hugo was made a lieutenant in the Regular Army. In this new position Mr. Hugo, in the Indian wars, saw much hard service and maintained a high character as a faithful, brave soldier, and Colonel Bliss, his commander, writes, "He is a perfecly honorable and upright man."

On the 21st of June, 1881, he was drunk at retreat roll call. For this alone he was tried by court-martial and dismissed from the Army. He is old and in want, and unable to work.

The members of the court-martial, the post of the Grand Army of the Republic at Albuquerque, N. Mex., where he lives, and many of his comrades pray for his relief from a judgment which was a terrible punishment of such a man for such offense.

Mr. HAY. I desire to say, further, that this is a unanimous report, and there were other facts not stated in the report which urged the committee to make the favorable recommendation which it has made.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, this is an effort to place on the retired list a man who is not now in the service, and although I dislike to do it, I must object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

SALE OF AUXILIARY NAVAL VESSELS.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House joint resolution 318, authorizing the sale of auxiliary vessels.

The joint resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the Secretary of the Navy be, and he is hereby, authorized to cause to be appraised by competent boards of officers of the Navy, to be designated by him for that duty, and to sell at public auction, after due advertisement, such of the vessels purchased since the 21st day of April, 1898, for auxiliary service in connection with the Navy as are no longer needed: Provided, however, That no such vessel shall be sold for less than its appraised value unless the President shall otherwise direct in writing: And provided further, That the net proceeds arising from the sales of vessels as herein authorized shall be paid into the Treasury.

Mr. HILBORN. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the reading of the report, which I think is the best statement that can be made.

Mr. BAILEY. I reserve the right to object.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. HILBORN) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Naval Affairs have had under consideration a proposed joint resolution (H. Res. 318) authorizing the sale of auxiliary vessels of the Navy, and report the same to the House with a recommendation that it pass.

The proposed authorization relates only to such auxiliary naval vessels as were purchased for temporary service during the late war and can now be disposed of without detriment to the service. In a letter to the committee the Secretary of the Navy says:

"While it is considered that the language of section 1541 of the Revised Statutes, in conjunction with the acts of August 5, 1882 (22 Stat., 296), and March 3, 1883 (22 Stat., 599), might perhaps be so construed as to sanction the sale of the vessels referred to, such interpretation, if adopted, would likewise warrant the sale, at executive discretion, of any vessel of the Navy. I am not satisfied, after considering together the several statutory provisions on the subject, that they confer authority to sell public vessels that are in good repair and are entirely serviceable and the sale of which is desirable merely because the exigencies under which they are acquired have passed. It seems preferable, therefore, before action is taken in the matter, that the special authorization of Congress to make necessary sales be secured, and the inclosed draft is accordingly submitted, with the recommendation that it may receive favorable consideration by the committee."

The resolution herewith reported by the committee is substantially as recommended by the Secretary of the Navy.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to ask the gentleman from California if he was not able to accompany this report with a list of those vessels which have been bought?

Mr. HILBORN. The report of the Secretary of the Navy and the reports of the heads of the bureau contain all of these lists, and also the prices paid for all of them.

Mr. BAILEY. And the parties from whom they were purchased?

Mr. HILBORN. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. I think myself that it is desirable to dispose of them as soon as possible, because the longer we keep them the less we will get for them.

Mr. HILBORN. Certainly.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to ask the gentleman if the resolution provides for the proper advertising in advance of the sale?

Mr. HILBORN. Oh, yes.

Mr. MOODY. I should like to ask the gentleman from California a question. Is there anything in the bill which would authorize the Secretary of the Navy to transfer these vessels to other Departments of the Government?

Mr. HILBORN. There is not.

Mr. MOODY. I should like to ask the gentleman if he has considered the question whether it would be desirable to so transfer any of the vessels?

Mr. HILBORN. We have considered it.

Mr. MOODY. There is a very great call for vessels in all departments of the service, is there not? I should like to ask the gentleman whether the committee have considered the advisability of transferring any of these vessels to the Treasury Department, the War Department, or some other Department of the Government?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. Will my friend from California permit me to answer briefly?

Mr. HILBORN. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY. I should be glad to receive the information.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. A proposition of that nature has been made, but the Committee on Naval Affairs have not felt authorized to incorporate a provision of that kind in the bill now before the House, for the very obvious reason that that would authorize the Secretary of the Navy to transfer to the different Departments of the Government vessels the use of which had never been granted to those Departments by the Congress of the United States. For instance, if the Secretary of the Navy had the opinion that the transfer of some ship of the Navy to the Army would greatly facilitate the operations of that Department, the fact would remain that the Congress of the United States had not authorized the War Department to have the use of such a vessel.

Mr. BAILEY. That could be done in this very resolution; and if it be true that there is any need for these vessels, this very resolution could authorize the Secretary of the Navy to transfer such as it is desirable to transfer, and to sell the others.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. The objection would still remain that we have had no action of Congress to determine that that Department should be granted the use of such a vessel.

Mr. BAILEY. I understand we have not, but we would have, immediately upon the passage of the resolution. I know nothing of the state of facts indicated by the gentleman from Massachusetts. I have supposed that in the excitement of the war we bought many more such craft than we need in time of peace.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That is undoubtedly the fact.

Mr. BAILEY. I would suppose it to be wise to dispose of them as soon as possible, and thus get as much out of them as possible.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. But the Committee on Naval Affairs had not before it any evidence that other Departments needed vessels, and it did not seem to us, on the face of it, desirable to put upon the Secretary of the Navy the responsibility of deciding what facilities of transportation should be given to the Army or what addition of ships should be made to the Coast Survey or the Revenue Marine.

Mr. BAILEY. Can the gentleman from Maine tell me if these vessels to be disposed of include the yachts and such like that were bought up at that time?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It means the disposal of all vessels bought under the exigencies of war which it is not necessary to retain.

Mr. BAILEY. Would that include the vessels we bought in Great Britain, which were constructed under contract for the Government of Brazil?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. It would not; for the resolution itself provides that it shall apply only to those vessels which are not desirable to be retained permanently in the Navy.

I want to state further, to make it perfectly clear, that there is a law on the statute books for the disposition of vessels of the Navy that are condemned by proper authority, and authorizes the Department to sell them at auction to the highest bidder. But the Secretary of the Navy, in his recommendation of this measure to us, stated—and the committee regard it as a very proper statement—that he did not feel sure that that legislation was broad enough to authorize the Department to sell ships that were in good order.

The statute related to vessels that were desired to be disposed of, because their term of usefulness had passed, and that they should be condemned; but this is to dispose of the ownership of United States vessels not necessary in the usual operations of the Navy Department and that were bought for an exigency, for a specific service, and it is not now desirable to retain them in the service.

Mr. BAILEY. And now the Secretary of the Navy can either hold or sell these other vessels?

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. He can dispose of those vessels that have been condemned and can retain these others if the best interests of the Government require their use.

Mr. BAILEY. It is not absolutely required that he shall sell them all.

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. No; not to sell any ships of the United States that are properly adapted for the regular use of the Navy.

Mr. PAYNE. I want to suggest to the gentleman from Maine whether——

Mr. TERRY. In the further unfolding of the present undeveloped policy may we not have to buy these ships back again? [Laughter.]

Mr. BOUTELLE of Maine. That would depend very much upon the coolness or the ardor of those who wanted to go to war.

A MEMBER. I object.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill?

Mr. HEPBURN. I object, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. MAGUIRE. I want to ask the gentleman from California a question?

Mr. HILBORN. Certainly.

Mr. MAGUIRE. Would it not be better in the present state of the case to authorize the Secretary of the Navy to transfer to other Departments such of these vessels as are required by them and not needed by the Navy Department, and provide afterwards for selling those that no other Department of the Government needs?

Mr. HILBORN. Up to this time Congress has always determined whether the other Departments of the Government, like the Treasury or the War Department, need vessels. After finding the fact that a Department does need them, it authorizes their purchase or building. If the suggestion of the gentleman were adopted, Congress would abdicate and give the right to the Secretary of the Navy to determine whether the War Department needed one or a dozen vessels and whether the Treasury Department needed one or a dozen vessels.

Mr. BAILEY. I was of the impression at first that it might be well that the Departments that could use these vessels should be permitted to use them; but, on reflection, I agree now that they ought to come to Congress and let it judge whether they should have vessels or not.

Mr. SHAFROTH. We generally act upon the recommendations of those Departments anyhow.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri and several other gentlemen have objected.

Mr. MOODY. I desire to ask the gentleman from California a question.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman from California yield to the gentleman from Massachusetts?

Mr. HILBORN. Certainly.

Mr. MOODY. Some inquiry has been made as to the number and character of the vessels to which this bill would refer. I have in my hand a list of vessels that are not to be retained in the service, furnished to the Committee on Appropriations by the Secretary of the Navy, and it might be of some use to have the Clerk read it. Or I should like to have it inserted in the RECORD. It is as follows:

Vessels which are not recommended for retention in the naval service.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. BAILEY. I have no desire to interfere, but I understand an objection was raised by the gentleman from Iowa.

The SPEAKER. Has any objection been made?

Mr. HEPBURN. I have been trying to make one.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Iowa objects.

CANAL, ETC., AT MUSCLE SHOALS, ALABAMA.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

A bill (H. R. 9335) granting to the Muscle Shoals Power Company right to erect and construct canal and power stations at Muscle Shoals, Alabama.

Be it enacted by the Senate and House of Representatives of the United States of America in Congress assembled, That the consent of Congress is hereby given to the Muscle Shoals Power Company, a corporation created and organized under a charter granted by the legislature of the State of Alabama, its successors or assigns, to erect, construct, operate, and maintain inlet and outlet races or canals and a power station or stations at a point or points at or near the Muscle Shoals in Tennessee River, that are, and always have been, unsuitable and unused for the purposes of navigation, and to make such other improvements as may be necessary within said limits for the development of water power and transmission of the same: Provided, That the constructions hereby authorized do not in any way interfere with the Muscle Shoals Canal, or with navigation of said river: Provided further, That until the plans and location of the works herein authorized, so far as they affect the interests of navigation, have been approved by the Secretary of War, the improvements shall not be commenced or built.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I want to reserve the right to object to that matter until an explanation is made by the gentleman.

Mr. BANKHEAD. Mr. Speaker, I ask the Clerk to read the report. It is very short.

The SPEAKER. Pending objection, the Clerk will read the report.

The report (by Mr. BURTON) was read, as follows:

The Committee on Rivers and Harbors, to whom was referred the bill (H. R. 9335) granting right to construct canal, etc., at Muscle Shoals, Alabama, respectfully report:

Your committee recommend, first, that the bill be amended by striking out, in lines 9 and 10, the words "that are and always have been unsuitable and unused for the purpose of navigation," because we regard such an expression of opinion as out of place in a bill of this kind; and second, by adding after line 5, page 2, the words "and the Secretary of War is authorized and directed to fix reasonable charges for use of said power." We regard it as proper that compensation should be made for the privileges granted.

The bill seems to provide all necessary safeguards to prevent injury to the works owned by the Government, and, when amended as above stated, the committee recommend that the same do pass.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection?

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I do not want to object, but I want to understand how that corporation is running that machine down there on the shoals.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Speaker, what committee reports this bill?

The SPEAKER. The Committee on Rivers and Harbors.

Mr. BANKHEAD. The corporation referred to is not running any machine at this time. They simply ask permission to operate on the Muscle Shoals a power company and use the water there that is not used in the canal, and such water as is not needed for the canal. The bill provides that their work shall not be begun or constructed until the Secretary of War authorizes it. The bill also provides that the Secretary of War shall fix a reasonable compensation for the use of water—that is, in case any compensation is required and just.

Mr. COX. Will the gentleman yield to me for a question?

Mr. BANKHEAD. Certainly.

Mr. COX. We have been discussing all through the river and harbor bill the improvement of these shoals.

Mr. BANKHEAD. This is a different shoal altogether. This is Muscle Shoal.

Mr. COX. Well, you have got to go through both shoals to get up the river. Now, here is a company proposing to use the water which will impede the navigation over the shoals.

Mr. BANKHEAD. No; this is an electric light company.

Mr. COX. And it does not affect the navigation?

Mr. ERMENTROUT. No; it gives you more light. [Laughter.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. I object.

The SPEAKER. Objection is made.

SENATE RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, the following resolution was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

Resolved by the Senate (the House of Representatives concurring), That there be printed 8,000 copies of the chronological list of battles in which troops of the permanent establishment have participated from the organization of the Army in 1789, together with statistics of losses and the names of officers wounded or killed in action; 1,000 copies for the Senate, 2,000 copies for the House, and 5,000 copies for the War Department—

To the Committee on Printing.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled joint resolution of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. Res. 344. Joint resolution granting authority to the Republic of Venezuela to send a cadet to West Point Military Academy.

The SPEAKER announced his signature to enrolled bill of the following title:

S. 5224. An act to extend the time for the construction of a bridge across the Missouri River, at or near the city of Boonville, Mo., by the Boonville and Howard County Bridge Company.

MARY R. FROST.

Mr. WEYMOUTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2871) for the relief of Mary R. Frost.

The bill was read, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to redeem, in favor of Mary R. Frost, United States 4½ per cent registered bonds issued under the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, No. 2235, for $50; No. 13657, for $100; No. 7392, for $500, inscribed in name of Mary R. Frost, with interest accrued and unpaid to the date of their maturity, said bonds having been lost in the mails after having been assigned in blank by the said payee: Provided, That the said Mary R. Frost shall first file in the Treasury a bond, in a penal sum equal to the amount of said missing bonds, and interest due on the same, with two good and sufficient sureties, residents of the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim because of the lost bonds.

With the following amendment recommended by the committee:

In line 16 strike out the words "equal to" and insert in lieu thereof the words "in double;" so it shall read, "file in the Treasury a bond in a penal sum in double the amount of said missing bonds."

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, reserving the right to object to that for a moment, I would like to hear the report.

Mr. WEYMOUTH. Mr. Speaker, I will say to the gentleman from Pennsylvania that this is a favorable report from the Committee on Claims—a favorable report from the gentleman's own committee.

Mr. BRUMM. All right; I withdraw any objection.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The committee amendment was considered and agreed to.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and accordingly it was read the third time, and passed.

ARREARAGES OF TAXES IN THE DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I present a conference report on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendment of the House to the bill (S. 4700) to receive arrearages of taxes due the District of Columbia to July 1, 1896, at 6 per cent interest per annum, in lieu of penalties and costs.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the House to the bill (S. 4700) entitled "A bill to receive arrearages of taxes due the District of Columbia to July 1, 1896, at 6 per cent interest per annum, in lieu of penalties and costs," having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the first amendment of the House and agree to the same amended as follows: In lieu of "ninety-eight" read "ninety-seven;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the second amendment of the House and agree to the same amended as follows: Instead of the date "January, 1900," read "July, 1899;" and the Senate agree to the same.

That the Senate recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the House relative to the title and agree to the same amended so as to read: "A bill to receive arrearages of taxes due the District of Columbia to July 1, 1897, at 6 per cent per annum, in lieu of penalties and costs;" and the Senate agree to the same.

JOHN J. JENKINS,
CHARLES F. SPRAGUE,
JAMES D. RICHARDSON,
Managers on the part of the House.
JAMES McMILLAN,
CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

STATEMENT.

The bill as it passed the Senate reduced the rate of interest from 12 to 6 per cent on arrearages of taxes paid prior to July 1, 1896, provided such arrearages were paid before January 1, 1899.

The House extended the provisions for 6 per cent interest to 1898, and extended the time of payment to January, 1900.

The conference reports in favor of extending the time to July 1, 1897, and the time for payment to July 1, 1899.

This is in accordance with the recommendations of the Commissioners of the District of Columbia, who say that the amendments of the House will confuse all tax matters for the reason that the list of property for sale for taxes in arrears for the year ending June 30, 1898, is now in preparation.

Mr. JENKINS. Mr. Speaker, I move the adoption of the conference report.

The motion was agreed to; and the conference report was adopted.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, I move that when the House adjourn to-day, it adjourn to meet at noon on Saturday next, which will give us a day to catch up with the work.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I offer an amendment to that, that when the House adjourns, we adjourn until 12.05 o'clock to-morrow.

The SPEAKER. That would not be in order.

Mr. BRUMM. Why, Mr. Speaker, it is not the regular hour.

The SPEAKER. That is one of the difficulties about it. Under the rules of the House, the House is required to meet at 12 o'clock.

Mr. BRUMM. Then, Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRUMM) there were—ayes 37, noes 52.

Mr. CLARDY. Mr. Speaker, I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question was taken on ordering the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. Two gentlemen only rising—not a sufficient number. The noes have it, and the House refuses to adjourn. The question now is on the motion of the gentleman from Illinois that when the House adjourn it adjourn until Saturday noon.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. BRUMM) there were—ayes 69, noes 16.

Mr. BRUMM. No quorum, Mr. Speaker.

The SPEAKER (after having counted the House). One hundred and eight gentlemen present—not a quorum. Under the rules of the House a call of the House will be considered as ordered; the yeas and nays are also ordered, and the Clerk will call the roll.

Mr. CANNON. Mr. Speaker, there is evidently no quorum in the Capitol. I do not desire to punish members on the one hand nor myself on the other to stay here an hour or two to get a quorum, and I move that the House do now adjourn.

The motion of Mr. CANNON was agreed to; and accordingly (at 4 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned until to-morrow at 12 o'clock noon.

SENATE.

FRIDAY, February 3, 1899.

Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. W. H. MILBURN, D. D.

The Vice-President being absent, the President pro tempore took the chair.

The Secretary proceeded to read the Journal of yesterday's proceedings, when, on motion of Mr. WOLCOTT, and by unanimous consent, the further reading was dispensed with.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Journal stands approved, without objection.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, I see by the Calendar that the Senator from Mississippi [Mr. MONEY] and the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] have given notice of an intention to address the Senate this morning upon the Vest resolution and other resolutions which have been offered and may be proposed as amendments to that resolution. Under the unanimous-consent rule we go into executive session at 2 o'clock, and I take it without question that those two Senators will naturally occupy the time of the Senate during the morning hour and until 2 o'clock.

Therefore I ask consent to address the Senate to-morrow, when that order shall be reached, upon the question of these resolutions. I desire to say that I have no wish to do other than hasten action upon the resolution, and that the time I shall occupy in the few remarks I have to make will not be, probably, over fifteen minutes or so.

Mr. GALLINGER. The Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] has given notice likewise for to-morrow.

Mr. WOLCOTT. I understand that the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] has likewise given notice for to-morrow.

Mr. PASCO. I was going to call the Senator's attention to that notice and ask if his notice would not interfere with it.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Not at all. Then I will follow the Senator from Texas at the conclusion of his remarks to-morrow, if there shall be time.

REPORT OF CAPITAL TRACTION COMPANY.

Mr. GALLINGER. I ask that Document No. 89, being the annual report of the Capital Traction Railway Company, containing a list of the stockholders, be reprinted with certain corrections that are indicated in the print I hold in my hand. There are some very palpable errors in it. For instance, one stockholder is credited with 15,705 shares, and it ought to have been 1,575. I ask that the document be reprinted with the corrections, and that the former print be destroyed.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from New Hampshire requests the reprint of the report to which he has referred, that certain corrections which he has indicated be made, and that the former document be destroyed. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the order is made.

Managers on the part of the Senate.
ROBERT R. HITT,
LEMUEL E. QUIGG,
HUGH A. DINSMORE,
Managers on the part of the House.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Maine asks for the present consideration of the report. Is there objection? The Chair hears none, and the question is on agreeing to the report.

Mr. GALLINGER. I notice that certain amendments were agreed to and certain amendments receded from, which are numbered, as is usual in conference reports, and of course the numbers convey no information to Senators who are not on the committee.

I was instrumental, when this measure was under discussion in the Senate, in getting the salaries of the consuls at La Guaira, Venezuela, and Pernambuco, Brazil, somewhat increased—increased to the point that had been recommended by the State Department. I trust that the conferees on the part of the Senate, representing the opinion of this body, were very insistent upon keeping those amendments in the bill, and I rise for the purpose of asking the Senator from Maine who has charge of this matter whether they succeeded in doing that very desirable thing.

Mr. HALE. We did the best we could. We got the increase for the consul at Pernambuco, but could not get it for the consul at La Guaira. As to the other amendments, in some cases the House conferees receded, and in some cases the increase of salaries put on by the Senate, as in the case of Naples, was adjusted by agreeing to a part of the increase.

Mr. GALLINGER. It is gratifying to me to know that there was partial success on the part of the conferees of the Senate.

If this should reach those two gentlemen, I presume I would be criticised if I should say what I am going to venture to say, that I think the case of La Guaira was stronger than that of Pernambuco. But, nevertheless, the gentleman at Pernambuco is the son of a former distinguished United States Senator who for a long time was President pro tempore of this body, and it is a gratification to me to have the son of that distinguished New Hampshire man recognized in this way. I sincerely wish we might have had the little increase that was asked for La Guaira, where an educated and enterprising man is serving for $1,500 a year in a climate that is about as bad as any on the face of the earth. He is really spending more than he is receiving, and he is a poor man at that. However, I am gratified to know that we have accomplished something for Pernambuco this year, and I will endeavor to look after La Guaira in the consular bill of next year.

The report was agreed to.

MONUMENT AT HAVANA.

Mr. HALE. From the Committee on Naval Affairs I report back favorably without amendment the joint resolution (S. R. 187) authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to have a monument erected at Havana, Cuba, to the memory of the sailors and marines who lost their lives by the explosion of the U. S. S. Maine and are there buried, and I should like to have it passed at the present time if there is no objection.

There being no objection, the Senate, as in Committee of the Whole, proceeded to consider the joint resolution, which was read as follows:

Resolved by the Senate and House of Representatives, etc., That the Secretary of the Navy is hereby authorized to have erected in the Colon Cemetery, at Havana, Cuba, a suitable granite monument to the memory of the sailors and marines who lost their lives by the explosion of the U. S. S. Maine in the harbor of Havana on the 15th day of February, 1898, and whose remains are buried in that cemetery, and to suitably inscribe and inclose such monument; and the sum of $10,000, or so much thereof as may be necessary, is hereby appropriated for this purpose out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated.

The joint resolution was reported to the Senate without amendment, ordered to be engrossed for a third reading, read the third time, and passed.

Resolved, That there be printed for the use of the Senate 1,500 bound copies of the Report of the Librarian of Congress for 1898, 500 for the use of the Senate and 1,000 for distribution by the Librarian of Congress.

MESSAGE FROM THE HOUSE.

A message from the House of Representatives, by Mr. W. J. BROWNING, its Chief Clerk, announced that the House had passed a concurrent resolution requesting the President to return to the House of Representatives House joint resolution numbered 298, now in his hands; in which it requested the concurrence of the Senate.

OUTRAGES ON AMERICAN CITIZENS IN CHINA.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore laid before the Senate the following concurrent resolution of the House of Representatives; which, on motion of Mr. HOAR, was considered by unanimous consent, and agreed to:

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES, February 3, 1899.

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), That the President be respectfully requested to return to the House of Representatives House joint resolution numbered 298, now in his hands.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. If there are no further resolutions, the morning business is closed.

Mr. MONEY. I ask the Chair to lay Senate joint resolution No. 191 before the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The joint resolution will be read by title.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 191) declaring that under the Constitution of the United States no power is given to the Federal Government to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently as colonies.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, preliminary to the remarks which I shall have the honor to briefly submit to the Senate by its indulgence I desire to say that if I shall make any statement of facts——

Mr. MASON. Will the Senator from Mississippi yield just one moment? I merely want to ask the Senator who now has the floor if he is advised as to what time we are to vote upon what is known as the Bacon and Sullivan resolutions. Has any hour been fixed or agreed upon?

Mr. MONEY. I am not in charge of any of these resolutions, nor am I able to indicate whether we shall vote upon those or any others.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair will inform the Senator from Illinois that no hour has been fixed.

Mr. MONEY. I am unable to answer the question. I have no intimation whatever that the Senate ever intends to vote at all upon any resolution.

Mr. MASON. I did not know.

Mr. MONEY. Mr. President, as I was just saying, if I shall make any statement of fact incorrectly in discussing the several resolutions before the Senate, or the questions cognate thereto, which may be permissibly debated in the open session of the Senate, I desire to be promptly corrected. It will not be considered an interruption, but a favor to myself, for I do not wish to be in the attitude, by sufferance or courtesy, of misstating anything that may tend to the elucidation of this very knotty problem which we are undertaking to solve.

No Senator who has occupied the floor upon this question has failed to remark upon the gravity of the question, of its great importance, not only to the Filipinos but to the Americans themselves, and I realize perhaps as fully as any other how very momentous it is, not concerning myself so much about the welfare of other peoples as I am concerned for the destiny of the great people whom in part I here represent.

In the history of the Roman republic there were times of great public exigency and of national peril, when the senate called from his place some great man and put into his hands the supreme authority of the republic. They said to him, "We suspend all laws, all courts, all civil processes, and we invest you with absolute power. But before you assume this great and exclusive authority we place one last command upon you, 'See that the republic shall suffer no detriment.'"

I feel, Mr. President, that the American people, triumphant in the grandest experiment ever made upon this planet for self-government, have imposed upon each one of us who sits here in judgment that solemn injunction, "See that the Republic suffers no detriment."

In the debate upon this question a great many men of straw have been constructed and have been ridden down and demolished with skill and valor, and the knights have retired from the field of their achievement with the air of conquerors. Now, I do not want to have any of these straw men in my way to-day, and therefore I shall make certain concessions. I want to say that I will state the case of my opponents, as I understand it, just as fairly as they would state it for themselves.

In the first place, I want to say that I concede fully the right of the United States of America to acquire territory by conquest, by purchase, by peaceful and voluntary annexation, and in the other ways competent to the sovereignties of the world.

I will undertake also to acknowledge that the treaty-making power has the right to negotiate by all the advantages of the situation, so far as Spain is affected, to secure the rewards of victory—"the spoil of our bow and of our spear." But I shall also argue, after Jefferson, Calhoun, and other men who respected the Constitution, that the treaty-making power, of which to-day we are a part, can only act within the limitations of the Federal Constitution, and that its actions and results must be in accord with the theory, structure, and objects of our Government.

It has been contended that the Constitution of the United States, the organic law of the land, the creator of the Senate and of the Executive, can not run in its full force in the whole domain of the United States; that it must be carried to Territories and dependencies by the law of the Congress; in other words, that the creature of the Constitution is more fully endowed with force and authority than its creator.

I deny that proposition, Mr. President. I care nothing for the quotations made here of decisions and of statutes, in every one of which the circumstances have not been detailed which led to the dictum or the judgment. They do not shake my conviction that wherever the flag of the United States floats, whether on sea or land, all of that domain which it brings within our jurisdiction is under and subject to the provisions of the Constitution of the United States.

When we acquire territory, by whatever manner, ipso facto over that acquisition exists the Constitution. Without that Constitution our bonds are dissolved and we are no longer a nation. By agreement with that instrument the laws of Congress have force and effect everywhere—in Territories, organized or unorganized, as well as in the States. Everywhere the test of life of the law is obedience to the Constitution. The Constitution is around and over the domain of the United States, as the atmosphere that envelopes the globe. It has the force, continuous and uninterrupted, of gravity itself, and though it may not manifest itself, it will do so whenever its creatures, the Congress and the President or the judiciary, shall do something which is repugnant to or inconsistent with its provisions.

The Constitution declares of itself that "this Constitution and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States, shall be the supreme law of the land." Of what land? Is it that land which is inclosed within the borders of the States and organized Territories, or is it the land wherever the jurisdiction of the United States is asserted? What authority has the United States itself anywhere but in and under this Constitution? By what device can a part be greater than the whole, or a part of an instrument go further than the instrument itself? Can it be an act of Congress can deny to any person the bill of rights given by the Constitution? How absurd the claim that a law of Congress can have a wider range than that Constitution, by whose consent the law may live. Where this Constitution is not, there can not be a law of Congress, nor jurisdiction of the Government of the United States, nor the United States themselves.

Mr. President, Senators who favor the ratification of the treaty have taken two positions regarding the inhabitants of the archipelago. They are concerned for the welfare of the Filipinos. It is asserted that they are unfit for self-government, and therefore it is unwise to put in this treaty anything which leaves them to themselves to organize their own government which will meet their peculiar needs. On the other hand, others assert that they are sufficiently civilized to enter into a half citizenship, and in that doubtful character will be a valuable acquisition to the population of the United States. Others speak of them as savages, to be dealt with according to our sovereign pleasure, as were our Indians. They are or they are not capable of becoming citizens, and between these dangerous Symplegades I do not see how those gentlemen are to steer their boat. If the Filipinos are not fit for self-government, then they are not fit for citizens of the United States. If they are fit for self-government or independent government, then it is our duty to let them take care of themselves in the way best suited to their intellectual, their moral, and material development. "The glorious privilege of independence" is as much their right as ours, as sweet to the lower as to the higher capacity, as dear to half-civilized as to enlightened nations, and the free people who deny liberty to those who have aspired, struggled, and died for it shall not be justified by the material gains they may hope to secure.

It is insisted that the commercial needs of the United States demand the possession of trading posts within the Orient, and I confess that the prospect of increasing trade has made a considerable impression upon my mind. There is in this proposition more of the accessory than of the necessary quality. I can say with the utmost frankness that this phase of the question is one of the most difficult that ever I have been called upon to decide. I have labored to a conclusion, endeavoring honestly to see whether it was better that the treaty should be ratified as it stands or that it should be amended. I felt that glow of enthusiasm which seemed to sweep like a wave over the country when the ensign of this Republic waved in supremacy in the Asiatic world. I felt the thrill of exultation that this Republic had at once become a potent factor in solving the world-wide questions. I felt in every ruddy drop that visited my heart a tingling of joyous pride when the great exploits of our sailors and soldiers astonished the world. The amazement of all Europe at the sudden, unexpected, and complete victory of our arms delighted me. In these things as an American citizen I have shared as fully as any man who advocates the treaty.

I know that there is much to be said on both sides of this question, else this debate would not have been prosecuted with such zeal and with such ability. I realize the advantage of the possession of an archipelago that for 1,200 miles extends along the whole front of China, a vast empire whose shell has been crushed, and that has granted concessions for railroads leading from its interior mountains, full of resources, down through the river valleys to the China Sea, bringing the commerce of millions of people, and I know the immense advantage of that situation. Perhaps Manila, as a free port, under American rule, would become the greatest emporium in the whole Orient in the progress of time, probably in a few decades. I know that our commerce would have a foothold, a coign of vantage there that would be to our profit; but while these advantages would help, they are not indispensable, and our commerce advances apace lacking them.

But are conquests and subjugation necessary to the spread of American products, either manufactured or raw? Have we depended heretofore upon those aids so much vaunted in this debate?

Mr. President, it happens that this country, which some gentlemen on this floor have called isolated (but which is in communication by telegraph and by steamer with every country on the face of the globe), has in its isolation, so called, during the last seven years increased its exports 18 per cent, while Great Britain, colonizing almost the whole of the earth held by the inferior races, has suffered a decrease of 5 per cent in the same period?

If England, with colonies that reach around the globe and which occupy an area of more than three times the whole of the United States, can not hold her markets by colonization, and if we encroach upon her in the markets which have hitherto been hers, what is the force of this commercial argument upon the Senate?

France also extended her dominion to extend her trade. She is the second in area of the great colonizing powers of the earth, yet we are informed that a few days ago M. Pelletan, the French minister, discussing the budget in the Chamber of Deputies, attacked the colonial system, declaring that France spent $16,000,000 annually on her colonies and obtained nothing except an increase in exports, in which there was a profit, perhaps, of $4,000,000. There was, in fact, no French colonization at all, but only military occupation. He entirely disbelieved, while the army cost $200,000,000 and the debt another $200,000,000, in the wisdom of spending $16,000,000 for the pleasure of ruling foreign populations. And what has been her loss in drain upon her manhood, energy, and brains, in blood more precious than her treasures?

Mr. HALE. Will the Senator permit me to ask him a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Maine?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Directly in the line of what the Senator is saying—I do not want to anticipate anything he is about to say—but has the Senator looked at the figures showing the amount of the trade of Great Britain with her largest and most colossal colony, India, with 250,000,000 people?

Mr. MONEY. Yes, sir.

Mr. HALE. Does the Senator know that the entire trade of Great Britain with that immense colony, containing 250,000,000 people, is only 7 per cent of her trade?

Mr. MONEY. Yes; I am aware of that, Mr. President; and I am obliged to the Senator for reminding me of it. I did not intend, however, to go particularly into details upon this point, but I will make this general remark, that England herself now sees the futility of this vast colony holding in promoting her foreign trade, and we have the expression deliberately made by the British administration that England no more desires to colonize and gain territory; that she only seeks trade; that she only asks open ports. While Germany, France, and Russia are disputing for possession of the territory of China, England in her struggle for open ports invokes our assistance. Yet Lord Salisbury, at the Lord Mayor's banquet the other night, declared that while the assistance which the United States would render when she becomes a factor in the oriental problem would be vastly beneficial to England, yet he doubted if it would conduce to peace. Yet Senators here advance the argument that we can not turn loose the Philippines unless we precipitate a war between the great European powers for the distribution of those islands among themselves. If such war comes, we will not be a party to it. If we seize and hold the islands for the benevolent purpose of preventing other nations from quarreling over them, we will inaugurate a war with the Malays of which I can not see the cost nor the end.

Mr. President, while I would do anything that would be proper to advance the commerce of the United States, yet it has not been proved that the extension of our commerce is dependent upon our possession of the Philippines, but, on the contrary, we are outstripping our competitors. The commerce of the United States, fortunately for this great Republic, has been founded more wisely upon the superior skill of its artisans; and in this, as in the public defense, it is the workingman who is the solid foundation of our prosperity and greatness. Superior excellence has carried our wares into the shops in all the cities of Europe, and in this day, when transportation is rapid and communication is instantaneous, there has been a reversal of the old feeling. It is Europe that fears America in industrial competition, and instead of depending upon the aid proposed here for fostering commerce, that Europe is alarmed, and the Austrian premier has suggested the idea to the chancelleries of the Old World that there must be a union of European powers against the trade of America. We find the protectionist system turned against us, and instead of walling ourselves in, we are about to be walled out by the manufacturing and agricultural interests whose "pauper labor" has been the bogie man for some and an exhaustless mine of wealth for others.

Even if we could do something in this regard to advance commerce, there is a greater consideration due to those who produce, when we recollect that the increased cost of a larger standing army, of a military and civil administration in the Philippines, and of an increased Navy will be made necessary, and that the taxation for this burden comes, not from the middleman, not from the carrier, but from the creator of wealth, from him who tills the ground, from him who takes the raw material to the shop and turns out the finished product that is to-day to be found in all the markets of the globe.

That which carries American commerce abroad is not the protection of this Government; it is not that the flag of the fighting Navy of the United States is found on every sea and in every port; it is the superior skill of the American workingman, who demands a larger wage, a better living, a larger reward, as his share of the fruits of his industry, than any other workingman on this globe. Everywhere you will find that commerce depends, not upon these adventitious aids we propose to give, but it depends upon the skill, the industry, and the superior workmanship of the artisans who toil at the forge, in the shop, and at the looms, and in the fields of the country.

Nevertheless, Mr. President, this is an enticing topic, and I can understand how a man from a great commercial city will yield to the importunities of boards of trade and chambers of commerce, and will conclude to give his vote, neglectful of the general best interests of the country. The men who plow, who sow, who reap, who harvest, who create, are at last the foundation of this nation's prosperity, and they make the threat of a wall being raised against our exports idle and ineffectual. We can afford to laugh to scorn any threat of that sort.

But, Mr. President, there is a consideration of a moral character which should have its effect upon every man in this body whose vote is decisive for weal or woe, in my humble opinion, of the future of this Republic. This is a critical moment, and we are the people who are on trial, not the Filipinos. We, the Senate of the United States, are on trial; and for what we shall do on next Monday we will stand before the bar of public judgment. This is a critical moment, when a turn of the wrist will send the wheel to the right and carry the ship home and safe into harbor, or a turn to the left will lay her upon the rocks; and whether the turn shall be dexter or sinister, the future shall give judgment. It is a serious thought that we are about to do something for which our posterity may blush; that in the very exuberance of our strength we are about to exercise it without judgment or mercy; that we esteem but lightly the rights, the liberties, the sacrifices of a people who for one hundred years have groaned under the tyranny of aliens. Are all these 10,000,000 people—nobody knows how many—unworthy of any consideration in this vast international transaction?

It is said that we have not treated with these people as allies or as auxiliaries. Mr. President, let us not deceive ourselves, for we shall not deceive anybody else. Senators fear that we will lose prestige if we recede from the advanced step which they say we have taken, and we have heard a lot of rant and fustian that would do credit to a lot of barn-storming tragedians about hauling down the flag. We all know that no hand but the hand of an American will ever do that. Of this we are perfectly satisfied. When we lower the colors, it will be because national honor and good faith demand it, and not otherwise.

Mr. President, it may be true that the Filipinos were not our allies or auxiliaries, yet it is perfectly evident that they believed that they sustained that relation to us; that they were persuaded into that belief by the acts and representations of the American officials, both civil and military, in that quarter; that as allies they did render the aid asked of them, cooperating with us in perfect confidence that we would keep faith with them—the faith plighted by the accredited agents of this Republic. It is true that the State Department had advised our consul at Singapore that "this Government has known the Philippine insurgents only as discontented and rebellious subjects of Spain." These instructions were never communicated to the Filipinos; and they still continued their cooperation with us, and had already rendered us most valuable and efficient service. Let us review the history of this transaction.

After Dewey's glorious victory in Manila Bay our consul, corresponding with him, asked if Aguinaldo could be of any service. Aguinaldo, as you recollect, is a man who in some quarters has been described as a sort of blackguard insurgent and a traitor against the United States. He never yet owed allegiance to us, and we have not had possession of his country. He has been proclaimed from time to time an adventurer, a traitor, and a bandit, and insulted by other opprobrious epithets. Mr. President, the records submitted to us for our guidance and information in this matter, from which I presume our able and efficient commissioners derived their information, show that this man has had a most honorable career, that he is a brave, honest, sincere, and able man, and that with all his opportunities he is poor.

Mr. MASON. And that he never did sell his cause for money.

Mr. MONEY. He never sold anything for money. There had been a long and bloody struggle between Spain and her revolted subjects in the islands, both parties had suffered and were weary of the struggle, and to secure peace a treaty "or agreement" was entered into. Spain agreed to correct abuses in the civil administration and introduce many reforms, and to pay a large sum of money for the widows and orphans of the insurgents who had fallen in battle. On their side the Tagals were to cease hostilities, and as a guarantee of tranquillity Aguinaldo and about fifty of his principal followers were to expatriate themselves. Four hundred thousand dollars was paid in cash to Aguinaldo, who, with his fellow exiles, went to Hongkong. No part of the balance of the stipulated sum was ever paid. One of Aguinaldo's officers sued for a division of the money. The dispute was settled by a payment out of court of $5,000 to the claimant. Aguinaldo was living modestly at Hongkong, declaring that the money was a trust fund and could not be put to a private use, and as the Spanish had failed to keep their promise of reform, it should be devoted to the purposes of another rebellion, and it was expended in the purchase of the munitions of war.

It has been denied here that there was an insurrection there previous to the arrival of Dewey; yet this book, first submitted confidentially for our use and then made public by order of the Senate, shows that there was all the time no pacification there whatever, but insurrection unceasing; that in the months of January, February, March, and April the insurgents were in arms, and that they were within 5 miles of Manila; that there were daily battles; that the hospitals were continually filled with wounded; that the dead were brought in every day, and news came of one battle after another all over the island of Luzon, and that the Spanish garrisons were besieged or had surrendered in many provinces. That is the testimony of our consul at Manila, who was a witness of the things he spoke of and who is corroborated by many circumstances.

These people were under arms to do what? To acquire their liberty, to conquer their liberty—these people, who had groaned for a hundred years under exactions and tyranny in comparison with which those which drove our forefathers into rebellion in 1776 were trivial—these people, not discouraged by repeated failures nor by bloody punishment, were making another effort, as they had been doing again and again for a hundred years. Then Aguinaldo was sent for, not to excite insurrection against Spain, but to control these forces already organized in rebellion in the interests of the American attack upon the Spanish forces in Manila and the islands of the Philippines. This is evidenced by the proclamation of the junta at Hongkong, by the proclamation of the junta at Singapore, by the correspondence of our consul, Mr. Pratt, at Singapore, of Mr. Wildman, at Hongkong, and of Mr. Williams, in the city of Manila.

Aguinaldo, on his part, promised that he would conduct the war with humanity; that he would control the forces that were operating against the Spanish at that time around Manila, and he was only put on board ship at Singapore when Commodore Dewey telegraphed, "Send Aguinaldo at once." He went to Hongkong and there he put himself into the hands of another American consul, Mr. Wildman, who, in the secrecy of night, to prevent any interference, himself put Aguinaldo and 17 of his officers on board the U. S. S. McCulloch and sent them to Manila. There he was put ashore and taken to the arsenal at Cavite and was furnished by the Americans with the arms which he required.

The chiefs who were carrying on this revolution throughout the different provinces rallied around him and made him their leader. They came promptly in and gave their adhesion to him. Then the correspondence continued between General Anderson, commanding the American forces, and General Aguinaldo, commanding the insurrectionary forces of the Philippines. He was asked to give passes to our officers to go through his lines and was requested to furnish us with the material of war. He did give us carts, bullocks, horses, firewood, and everything else we demanded of him. In these communications he is called our ally; in others he is called our auxiliary; but in every instance, unaware of the instruction of our State Department, he trusted to the open declarations of our civil and military officers that he was our ally and auxiliary. It makes no difference what our mental reservations were, Aguinaldo acted in good faith, and we are compelled to make those people understand that we are not to repudiate the understanding which we gave of our relation to them.

True hearts are more than coronets,
And simple faith than Norman blood.

Mr. President, are these people capable of independent government? The question is not of self-government. There are but two self-governing peoples on this globe, and one of them maintains its existence because neutrality is guaranteed by the great powers of Europe. Others have the form of a republic, but not the genius and spirit. They are good enough republics on paper, but in practice they fall short of the principles which they declare. The Asiatic mind, in my opinion, never will conceive the idea of self-government as we understand and as we practice it.

Take France for an example. That nation while a monarchy was for more than a hundred years in the very fore front of civilization. She gave to the world art, science, literature, and manners—everything that adds to the politeness and refinement of the human race. But self-government finds difficulties, not insurmountable, perhaps, which seem to inhere in the genius of her people and menaces the stability of their government. I, for one, do not believe that there is in the Latin nations that capacity for self-government which the Teutonic and Anglo-Saxon mind conceives and has put in successful operation.

But that is not the question, Mr. President. A people may be great, they may be happy, they may be successful, they may be enlightened, they may be cultured, refined, and advanced to the very highest pitch of civilization, and yet not fitted to maintain the institutions which we enjoy. I say it is impossible for those people with any amount of cultivation and education to ever become a self-governing republic; but they must take that which fits them. And why should the Senate here be solicitous about a people 9,000 miles away, whether they take the American form of government or not?

Whatever government they may adopt, it will be infinitely better for them than the one under which they have groaned for three hundred and fifty years.

Whatever form of government any people have is exactly the government which they need. It is the result, and has been everywhere, of an outgrowth and development; it is the evolution of the moral, spiritual, and intellectual nature of man, and it can not be anything else. If he wanted or needed anything to make him better and happier, he would have it, but he would have it by the very law which gave him that which he has; and it is useless for you to attempt to fit this Government upon them. You might take one of our forest oaks and strip the bark off from the slender topmost bough down to the deepest root and attempt to put that bark upon a banana plant in the island of Luzon with just as much success as you could take our institutions and fit them upon the inhabitants of that island.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator yield for a question?

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Does the Senator from Mississippi yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. MONEY. Certainly.

Mr. CAFFERY. I wish only to suggest to him that the advocates of the treaty appear to be certain of but one thing, and that is the taking of the islands. They are absolutely uncertain as to how long they are going to keep them or what sort of a government they think they will be capable of; in fact, they grope in a region of uncertainty.

Mr. MONEY. Very much so.

Mr. CAFFERY. In the line of the Senator's argument as to the incapacity of those people to govern themselves, I would suggest to him an inquiry as to what is proposed to be done with them after that incapacity shall have been ascertained.

Mr. MONEY. Well, Mr. President, there is a great deal to be said on this subject, but it is too varied in its phases to be exhausted or even touched upon in a speech in the time which will be allowed to me. But I wish to say that these people have a share of intelligence. The illiteracy in Luzon is not one-third of what it is in the peninsula of Spain. They have at least been well taught by the monastic orders, which now are to be driven out of the country, or are about to proceed from it on their own motion, and they have had a great deal to do in shaping the national character. I have sometimes thought that the superior capacity of the Mexican for progress in government over the other Spanish-American people had been determined by the fact that the Franciscans and Dominicans had control absolutely, to the exclusion of the other Catholic orders in that country. The Dominicans, the white friars, have taught the people how to think, and the Franciscans, or the black friars, have taught them how to behave. In other words, the teachers of faith and the teachers of practice have done more toward making those people capable of government than any of the other South American or Spanish-American people.

But this government which is now organized and of which Aguinaldo is the head has been denounced as a dictatorship. Aguinaldo did that thing which is the common thing and the proper thing and the only thing to do in the history of insurrections. He did what we did, what every South American country did, what Greece did, what every insurrectionary country that seeks to relieve itself from tyranny has done. First they went to war in scattered bands, with little organization; then they came together without a head; then there was a dictatorship, as George Washington was appointed dictator, as Simon Bolivar was appointed dictator. After that was done, which was simply a tentative and provisional form of government, when "peace comes and broods over a country with its white wings like a dove," "when war's wild blast has blown," the people organized the real government; and these are only preparatory steps leading up to that conclusion.

What kind of men is it that compose the Filipino Congress? The latest writer, Mr. Roberson, who visited the Congress while in session, gives a very favorable account of their character and ability. Of the 83 members sitting 17 were graduates of European universities, and the president, Pedro Paterno, took his degree as D. D. in the University of Madrid, and afterwards received his degree of LL. D. from the University of Salamanca. He is an author of such reputation that his books have been translated into German.

Major Bell, the chief of our secret service at Manila, under passes from Aguinaldo, visited many of the Philippine bands and became personally acquainted with many of their leaders. He speaks of them as brave, honest, and patriotic. Only two are called dishonest, and the adjutants he esteems bright, educated, and patriotic.

These are the men whom it is now proposed to sacrifice in order that we may have certain commercial advantages in the Orient. I ask you, Senators, does that commend itself to your consciences as representatives of the American people, as the custodians of their honor, their dignity, their majesty? I ask you, is that consistent with your sense of justice? Those people have labored under the impression that we went there to attack Spain at a vulnerable point and with the ultimate purpose, judging from our high-sounding declaration, that we would not interfere with the rights of the Cubans to govern themselves, and believed that the same declaration would apply to all other people struggling, as were the Cubans, for liberty.

These people have an organized army. Nobody denies that. Mr. Robinson, who has been to the capital, says that Aguinaldo has to-day 65,000 men, well trained, well armed; that the provinces contain 2,000,000 people who acknowledge allegiance to this provisional government, and that a greater supply of men can be had when they are wanted. Those are the people we are to disfranchise; those are the people we are to declare incapable of taking care of themselves; those are the people we are to subdue by arms. Whenever we shall ratify this treaty and the President shall issue his proclamation to the people of Manila, he should pin on the door of the national palace, with a sword, the declaration that we have not gone forth to conquer, but we have gone forth to defend the right. What a terrible commentary upon the honesty of the American Congress if in a war we said we had begun because humanity no longer could hear the cries and groans of those who suffered at our doorsteps, that we would not be passive a moment longer while these people were suffering and struggling and fighting for liberty in Cuba, when we declared that we were engaged in the holiest business that could occupy the minds of men—if in the case of the Philippines we should now repudiate that declaration.

"The sweetest libation that liberty draws is from the hearts that break and bleed in her cause." Is that true as to the West Indies and untrue as to the East Indies? Is a Cuban to be cherished and to be the subject of anxious solicitude, for whom we pour out our blood and our treasure, and the Malay, at the other end of the world, under the same circumstances, with increased aggravation to incite rebellion, not only not to receive our sympathy but to be subjugated to our power? Have we gone into the business of buying men?

Now, I know very well that it will be said that the people go with the land, and that if we take the cession of territory under the treaty they go with it. That is true.

But I wish to ask if it was not the extremity of Spain that gave us the islands under such circumstances? In old times, when there was little law, international or otherwise, in the termination of conflicts the law of uti possidetis always prevailed; that is, every man kept what he had. It was—

The good old rule,
* * * the simple plan,
That they should take who have the power,
And they should keep who can.

That was the practice of nations. As we increased in civilization and respect for law, then we began to engage in exchanges, and at last, after struggle and travail, we began to consider human rights, to consider the men going with the land; and for that reason I say that the very moment this treaty is ratified by the Cortes of Spain and becomes a part of the municipal law of this land, as it does under the Constitution, every living soul in the islands becomes a citizen of the United States of America, a citizen amenable to its laws and privileged and endowed with all the muniments of title to liberty by the Constitution of the United States. That is true not only of every child born there but of every man there.

Further, that it was so considered in the forming of this treaty, else there would be no point in the provision made there that every resident of the islands should have the privilege within a stated time of going before an officer and recording his intention of retaining his allegiance to Spain. The allegiance passes with the possession, and these people are citizens whenever this treaty is ratified. Not citizens with the right to vote, because that is a privilege which only the States can confer. They will be citizens, however, in the sense that they are under the ægis of the Constitution, and I defy Congress or the Executive to do one single act that would impair the rights of a citizen of Alaska or the Indian Territory or the territory we propose to take now by purchase or subjugation.

Under the law of uti possidetis, by the arbitrament of arms, what would we take if we settled upon that ancient custom? We would have the sandy point of Cavite, and that would be all. The attack upon Manila was made the day the protocol was signed, and was made through ignorance of our officers, of course, and under the laws of nations it would have been our duty to immediately put back into the hands of the Spaniards what we had taken. The law of nations requires that upon a change of situation of that sort, made without knowledge of the truce, the offending party shall place things in statu quo as far as possible.

We hold it, then, not by conquest, as asserted here, but because of the protocol. We hold it because the protocol said that pending the discussion and negotiation of a treaty of peace the possession of Manila, the city, bay, and harbor, should be in the United States. How long? Pending these negotiations, and no longer; and these negotiations have stretched far beyond the mind of the men who signed the protocol. We did not seem to know what we wanted, and our wants grew with the anticipation of what we could get. We could have gotten a great deal more if we had gone on with firmness, because we were dealing with an enemy that had fallen beneath our stroke and was at our mercy.

Now of the rights of the Filipinos in this matter: They are capable of independent government as good as any which they have ever enjoyed, for they could not to save their lives form a government that would be so iniquitous and so oppressive as that of the monastic order that held sway in the islands and disposed of governors, general officers, and people as they saw fit. There can be no worse government than that.

Another thing. This cession of territory which we have acquired some say is by conquest, but we all know it was by purchase, unless "conquest" means that we have so reduced the strength of our enemy to resist, so reduced his ability to cope with us, that he is prostrate at our feet. In that sense we have made a conquest. In that sense we could take territory from the Pyrenees to the Mediterranean. The whole peninsula was subject to us. It was conquest in that sense. But if it means occupation, then I deny that we occupied the Philippines at all, if the protocol was of any effect; and nobody can deny that.

Now, Mr. President, some gentlemen say that these people are not fit for citizenship in the United States, and I would be glad if some one, before this discussion closes, would define a policy for the information of those who do not trust the treaty, and tell us in plain language what you mean to do. Nobody has vouchsafed any information on this point. No man has said, "I will have them come in as citizens at some time. I will hold them in a territorial condition for a while and then give statehood." We can accept the cession with no other ultimate point in view. Nor have they said that they will hold them as mere subjects under a military occupation, or a sort of civil and military administration, the most obnoxious form of government that can be devised.

I do not believe there is a man here who dares to say that he would take the Filipinos as citizens of the United States. If so, these islands come in with their representatives in the Senate and in the House. Does any man in the Senate say that he is willing that the Filipinos shall determine who shall be the next President of the United States? Is he willing that the Filipinos shall determine the foreign and domestic policy of the United States? Is he willing that they shall say by their votes in this Chamber and the other that we shall declare war in order to conquer the island of Formosa, or any of the other islands of the Orient which would be agreeable to them, to enhance their power in these two Chambers? Immediately the Filipinos will be seeking auxiliaries. They would want accession to their power in this and the other House, and they would demand that we should make war from one end of the Orient to the other, that they might sit here, the supreme arbiters of the destinies of the American people. We want no possibility of that sort. While the future may be dark and gloomy, yet shadows come out of the mist and present themselves not only as possibilities but probabilities of this case, and we can not fail to take them into account.

On the other hand, unwilling to take these men as citizens like ourselves enjoying statehood, with power equal to that enjoyed by the American, who occupied and developed this great country, what will you do with them? Is it the understanding of the advocates of this treaty that those people shall occupy the relation to this country of conquered subjects? Are we to send them governors and proconsuls?

I have been told here that I had no faith in the American people. I have faith in them. I believe they will do right, but it does not rest with the American people. It rests with the American Senate; and I want to say, with all respect for my honorable colleagues, that I have not half as much faith in them as I have in the American people. I have seen laws made here which I could not approve, and which the American people condemned. I know that humanity everywhere is tarred with the same stick. Every nation, no matter how great or powerful or honorable, is touched with a common infirmity. We know that the Anglo-Saxons are long enduring, constant, of sustained purpose, of dogged courage and fixed resolution, which make them capable of the greatest achievements in government, but we also know that our history shows that they have been a land-grabbing people from the beginning.

I ask, then, what would you do with these people 9,000 miles away? Why was Warren Hastings, after he had been Governor-General of India, impeached before the House of Lords by the most brilliant array of orators that figured in British history? When Lord Clive, whose genius shed imperishable luster upon British arms, came back loaded with laurels, and, unfortunately, with money also, to enjoy his honors in England, notwithstanding the glamour of the great victory at Plassey, he was investigated by a committee. He said, "Gentlemen, when you accuse me of these things and I consider my opportunities, I am astonished at my own moderation." And other generals will be astonished at their moderation, as Lord Clive was after he had stripped rajahs, begums, and nabobs of their treasures. The world is the same. These tendencies are worse in some people than in others, but at last all share the same weakness. Opportunities sometimes develop that in a man which nobody ever recognized before. The opportunity to do mischief is something I do not care to afford to anybody.

What may be done to the Filipinos is one thing which has not been determined, it seems, in anybody's mind. Yet it does seem, before we fix irrevocably this law, which is to be the supreme law of the land, that somebody ought to formulate a policy. Who is going to do it? I have been told that they are waiting for Congress to adjourn, that the President and his Cabinet may get up a form of government for the Filipinos. That is pretty cool, when we consider the fact that the Constitution devolves that power upon Congress and not upon the Executive; that it is not the business of the President—and I speak with great respect of him personally and for his high office. I say it is none of his business about the form of government. That is a matter which concerns this body and the House of Representatives. It is not only their prerogative, but is a duty which the Constitution imposes, and which they can not shirk or avoid.

It has been considered almost a crime here to oppose the Executive. That is another danger. The subserviency of the Senate to the Executive is one of the dangers of this situation. Let this coordinate branch of the Government maintain its dignity and power, such power as is granted to it by the Constitution.

Some newspapers demanded that we should vote upon this treaty before it had been presented to us by the Committee on Foreign Relations. Those who did not agree to it in form without amendment were denounced as obstructionists before the slightest effort was made at progress, and at last, in their importunate eagerness for us to do something without deliberation, to discharge a momentous duty without due consideration, some part of the press lapsed into a condition of fretful and feverish mendacity which reflected on every man who opposed the treaty unamended, who did not agree to vote for the treaty.

This representation of obstruction was put out daily in the press, and it was said that the debate on the Maritime Canal Company was a part of the scheme of obstruction, when no effort had been made to bring forth the treaty, and when a little inquiry would have shown that this side of the Senate was ready to debate or to vote whenever they were invited to do so.

We can bear calmly these criticisms; they have had no effect, we trust, to the sober judgment of the American people, and if we can not do that, we can do our duty and retire, and let other people come here in our places. We are not necessary to the business and the welfare of the country. There are thousands of men in the United States who can sit in these places and who will conduct the Government successfully. All we have to do is to do our duty as we conceive it.

I do not say that gentlemen on the other side are not so sincere and not so earnest in their opinion about the rightfulness of their position as I am about mine. Something depends upon environment; and it may be that the "fierce light that beats about the throne" has spread a little of its luster upon people here who in their hearts are opposed to the annexation business or the possessing business or the sale and purchase business, or whatever name with which the future historian may dignify it.

What is going to be the result of this action, if it shall be taken, upon the American people? And they are the ones we are to consider. It is due to us to say that we would not break faith with anybody on earth. Those people who feel that this country would lose something of its prestige if we retired from the advanced step taken in the flush of victory, if the flag were taken down, are totally without justification for their anxiety.

Would this country suffer in the moral esteem of the universe if, after having exacted this much from an overthrown adversary, we should recede from that large demand; if we should say, "We have concluded that we will not take the sovereignty of the Philippines; that we will not be a factor in oriental complications; that we will not be a world power in the sense that we are to interfere and have a say in every discussion as to partition of territory and trade in the East; that we will not conquer and subjugate the Filipinos; but will be moderate; we will be generous; we will be magnanimous in our treatment of these people;" and we will say to Spain, "Here, take the third article back. You have ceded your sovereignty to us; we do not wish sovereignty there. Say now that you will relinquish your sovereignty in the Philippine Islands, and we will say on our part to the Filipinos, who have relied upon us, to some extent at least, 'Take your country and do with it what you will?'"

I do not mean an immediate evacuation, whose horrors have been portrayed upon this floor, but evacuation as the necessity of the case will permit; the withdrawal of American troops from Manila as from the island of Cuba; a protectorate sufficient to maintain public order; a protectorate sufficient for this government in embryo to organize itself formally and perfectly, to set itself in operation, to put its hand upon public affairs, and to begin the administration of them. Then we should retire. Would we suffer in the esteem of Spain? Would we suffer in the esteem and friendship of the Filipinos? Would we suffer in the esteem and respect of Europe generally? No, Mr. President; but the great Republic would immensely add to her reputation for honor, for magnanimity, for generosity, for love of freedom, if we made this concession.

But in the flush of victory we think only of our advantages. This is a time when, in my opinion, we ought to be cool; we ought to be collected. There never was a moment in the history of this Republic that we could more solemnly join that invocation of the "Recessional"—

> Lord God of Hosts, be with us yet,
> Lest we forget, lest we forget.

In the hot flush of triumph protect us from ourselves. Let us not with our own hands stain the immaculate shield of the American arms. Let us not with our own hands degrade the banner of our authority in any land.

Mr. President, leaving out of calculation the taxes that will be exacted from the working people and the producers of this country, leaving out all these things that tend to a larger establishment of Army and Navy, we have to consider this further fact. It may be immaterial to some. It may seem inconsequential to some, but to my mind it is the most serious in all this most serious controversy. What effect will the military occupation of the islands, 9,000 miles away, comprising 10,000,000 people, have upon the American character? This Government is founded upon a presupposition of the ability and capacity of the man, individually speaking, to understand liberty and his rights, and his courage to maintain them. The permanence of our free institutions depends altogether upon whether we can maintain this high type of manhood in this country. I will ask you whether there will not be attacks made upon its foundation when we begin military occupation of the Philippines with this ulterior design?

When we have thrown upon the American people the consideration of a great army, when we have induced them to consider the presence of a great military establishment, then we pave the way for the use of these same soldiers, of this great military talent, in our own land. We put into the hands of a class or a party or a man, when the time may be ripe for such a man, a great force with which our people have become familiarized, which they now dread, which they now fear, and the result will be that the introduction here will be easy of that which is now considered impossible. If any one thing can be done that will change the American type, if there is one single fact which will incapacitate them for self-government—in other words, which will destroy their individuality, destroy their demand for participation in governmental affairs, that will impair their jealousy of military power—that thing should not be done. These things may come to plague us in years to come. They are not impossible, they are not improbable; but, on the contrary, in my humble opinion, there will not be many decades before the policy that is now applied to the Philippines will be brought upon the American citizen himself.

I am not a pessimist; I have a distaste for the doctrine of Schopenhauer; I do not like the philosophy of disenchantment; I am naturally hopeful and sanguine, and am unwilling to play the part of Cassandra in predicting trouble and danger; yet to my mind we are called upon to inaugurate a new policy which neutralizes the Monroe doctrine, disregards the warnings of Washington, materially changes the character of our Government, and leads us into complications and entanglements full of disastrous consequences.

Another thing. We are told that we want peace; that we want to get the volunteers home. We all do. Everybody wants peace. I want the volunteers brought home. They have that right. They did not enlist for garrison duty. They did not enlist for a subjugating war. They enlisted for freedom. The struggle is over, the cause won, the banner flies triumphant, and they have a right to come home and be dismissed from the military service. They are not professionals pursuing a vocation; they are the citizen soldiery, who have other business.

Does any man say we are going to have peace by ratifying this treaty? Yes; we will have peace with Spain, but we will begin war with the Filipinos. We had a war with Spain that lasted three months. I stood right here and predicted on the 28th of March that we were about to engage in a war that would last sixty days, which would be a naval engagement, and that the ships of Spain would be swept from the sea. I am not a prophet, but I believed what I then said, and it has been justified by events. Now I say, standing here, that, in my opinion, if we ratify the treaty with no declaration in it that we disclaim any right to enslave these people, or to hold them in subjection, or use language which does not mean giving them their liberty, we have already embarked in a war that will not release the volunteers, but which will call for fresh volunteers, and thousands of the best American youth will lay their bones upon the plains and in the jungle of Luzon and in other parts of the Philippines.

We treat these people as though they were a homogeneous people, like those of Cuba or Porto Rico, when as a matter of fact there are four hostile races, totally different, speaking different dialects, perfectly dissociated in every respect.

We have claimed sovereignty, and we are to receive sovereignty from Spain over the third largest island in the group, to which Spain herself has no right of sovereignty, for after the war had ended with the treaty of 1876 a protocol was signed, to which Germany and England were signatories, in which the Sooloo, Mohammedan, and Malay acknowledged the suzerainty of Spain, and not sovereignty; and yet, under the terms of the treaty, we acquire sovereignty over them. In other words, we take a people who have been independent, who were at the beginning and at the ending of the war independent, and we make them our subjects without ever having a controversy with them about anything on earth, without any cause or warrant, without any justification for it but the lust for territory. We take into our subjection, under the cession of sovereignty from Spain, a people who acknowledged no sovereignty in Spain and were not her subjects, an independent people, just as the Egyptians are to-day while acknowledging the suzerainty of the Sultan of Turkey. There may be trouble upon that score.

In other words, as we discuss this question it opens up so many ramifications for evil, so many avenues for the mind to explore and to see the possibilities of the war that is yet to begin, that it is impossible to exhaust them in a day or a week or a month of discussion. Then the treasure that must flow, the taxes under which we are already a little bit dissatisfied, for I get letters every day protesting against the further continuance of the war tax, the stamp tax, and other taxes of that sort. We are about to engage in war, and how are we to avoid it if we sign the treaty as written?

I wish to ask Senators, why do you object to putting in the third article the words "that Spain shall relinquish her sovereignty and evacuate the islands?" What objection is there to that? Will Spain object? No. Will the Filipinos object? No. Will Europe object? No. Who objects? The people who want to extend the power of the Republic, as they say; to extend its boundaries, its commerce, at the sacrifice of principle and of plighted faith.

Here is a way out of the difficulty. In my opinion, and I can speak only for myself, with the Vest amendment, which would be adopted just as soon as it reached the Spanish Cortes, for it will certainly be gratifying to them, it will receive every vote in this Chamber in favor of the treaty. There may be some who will not vote for it at all.

Mr. President, there are several resolutions for the consideration of the Senate supposed to bear on the treaty. These resolutions are simply declarations of opinion. That is all they amount to. I am now declaring my opinion, and my vote upon one of these resolutions is not worth more than the declaration I am making to-day. Some of the resolutions are strong and some of them are weak. I do not characterize them in any spirit of criticism, but simply in their relation to this grave matter. They have no effect upon the decision of the controversy which we are about to engage in with the Filipinos, and that is the matter we are to consider now.

If we pass any of these resolutions, of what avail is it? Does that determine our relations with the Filipinos? Does that induce them to come in and make terms with us? Does that disband the Army? These resolutions are simply the text for discussion in open sessions of the Senate, and they are worth that and little more. As a solemn declaration of the opinion of the Senate they may move some future legislation by their persuasive influence, and not otherwise. If it were a joint resolution, a new Congress could be convened to repeal it in less than six weeks. So we who object to the condition as it has been under the phraseology of the present treaty must declare our opposition to it unless it is modified in the way indicated by the resolution of the Senator from Missouri [Mr. VEST]; and that, I think, would make it acceptable to every man on this side of the Senate, at least.

Mr. President, I do not suppose that any Senator is in any sense determined in his conduct in this or any other great matter except by the convictions of his own mind and that he is prepared to face the consequences. The American people will exercise a revisory judgment over the action that will be taken here. When the bills come in for the war with the Philippines, when one demand after another is made for volunteers, when the sick are brought home to get well and to die, when they perish in that tropical climate, so inimical to Europeans that after three hundred years of occupation the Spanish have only 16,000 residents upon the island, when these misfortunes come upon us, and when we have been stigmatized by the lovers of freedom as being false to the promise made, at least to the hope if not to the ear, when we have suffered in consequence in our own self-respect, then I believe that the American people will pass such judgment upon this action as will deter anything similar in the future.

Every man here holds his conscience in his own keeping; he is responsible for his own act, and I for one will feel recreant to myself, recreant to my high office, recreant to my duty to humanity, recreant to my duty to human liberty everywhere, if I fail to give my negative to a treaty that sold away the liberty of 10,000,000 human beings who, after a struggle of one hundred years, demonstrated through blood and suffering and sacrifice their worthiness for a better fate than is proposed. These men have struggled under every disadvantage. The Malay character has been developed in the ordeal of fire and blood to an excellence not attained by their kindred in any other part of the world. A hundred years through painful steps they have moved along a road which they have macadamized with their bones and cemented with their blood. The noblest aspirations that can fire the human heart have actuated these men, resistance to tyranny. This great Republic has reached its arm across the waste of water and helped these people to their feet, given them the opportunity to organize a government and to run the race for freedom according to their capacity.

Instead of that, Mr. President, shall we be the ministers of injustice, shall we be the deterrent forces to discourage the uprising for freedom elsewhere on the globe? Is the flag no longer to be the beacon that invites the people of an oppressed race everywhere to our shores, or is it to be the "balefire on the rock warning the world that approach is danger and contact is death?"

Are we to be the great exemplars of human liberty, or are we to join the ranks of the monarchs of the world in the lust for territory, the greed for conquest, for aggrandizement, and depart from that simplicity of liberty, of freedom, of the rights of man as set forth in our Declaration of Independence, as guaranteed by our Constitution? The fate of millions of people in the Philippines, of untold millions in America, rests upon the decision of the Senate.

Mr. President, I am admonished that I have occupied more time than I had intended. I had intended to say more upon the different phases of this question, for it is almost inexhaustible, but my friend the Senator from Virginia [Mr. DANIEL] desires the floor, and I therefore yield to him.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President——

Mr. HOAR. If the Senator from Virginia will pardon me, it lacks now only ten minutes of the close of the morning hour. In order that the Senator from Virginia may proceed without interruption, I ask unanimous consent that the unfinished business be now laid before the Senate as if it were 2 o'clock, and that it then be informally laid aside until he concludes his remarks.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. MASON in the chair). The Senator from Massachusetts asks that the unfinished business be now laid before the Senate. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Chair lays before the Senate the unfinished business.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

Mr. HOAR. I ask consent that it be informally laid aside and that the Senator from Virginia be permitted to proceed.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Senator from Massachusetts asks unanimous consent that the unfinished business be informally laid aside. Is there objection? The Chair hears none. The Senator from Virginia will proceed.

Mr. DANIEL. Mr. President, it is the first step that costs. To-day we are the United States of America. To-morrow, if a treaty now pending in the Senate is ratified, we will be the United States of America and Asia. Our name, like a hoop upon a barrel, marks the boundary of our national projection and ambition. It is proposed to embody into the American commonwealth as an integral part thereof a large and miscellaneous assortment of Asiatic islands, estimated in number at from 1,200 to 2,000, and to make citizens of the United States, with all the rights of citizenship which attach to the inhabitants of an American Territory, a large and miscellaneous and diversified assortment of people.

We are told by a number of Senators who have addressed us that of these islands and of this people we know but little. Our ignorance of them is a self-evident fact. The documents of our Government, in which have been collected such information as encyclopedias and books of travel would furnish, commence their imperfect account by telling us that both as to the islands and as to the people who inhabit them little that is accurate can be ascertained. We are invoked to do the gravest the most serious, and solemn act that can ever be done in the movement of mankind, an act in its nature implying permanence. It is to establish and to assert the sovereignty of the American people over these islands and over this people. For my part, Mr. President, I deem it inexpedient, unwise, and unjust that we should do so.

We are just emerging from a war of humanity, of liberty, and of national honor. In the beginning of that war, and in calling upon volunteers to follow our flag, both the Congress of the United States and the President of the United States declared our national purpose. Congress disclaimed in the joint resolution which led to war any intention of conquest. The President declared that forcible annexation was criminal aggression.

The war has been a glorious success. Our Navy has startled the world by the brilliancy of its achievements. Our Army has added new laurels to the chaplet of its veteran glories. Our people have been united as no people ever were united in supporting a National Administration.

Victory came on eagle's wings to our standard, and on the 1st day of January of the present year the last of the empire of Charles V vanished from the American continent and the dream of Spain for universal empire turned to dust and ashes.

In war, Mr. President, it is the unexpected that happens. So in every great and new adventure of peace. We are asked now to sally forth 7,000 miles from our native seat to grasp, against their will, a million of unwilling people—to seize upon them, to take them by force of arms and deposit them, land and people, within the lines of the Constitution under the American flag, to make them an integral part of this American Republic.

I do not believe that the great body of the American people understand the significance of this treaty. I do not believe, at least if I may judge from their utterances, that many Senators who are saying, "Vote for the treaty now and fix your policy to-morrow," understand what that treaty does irretrievably. That treaty fixes our policy. The rest of our policy is a mere matter of clerkly detail. The treaty is the thoroughfare, and through and over that thoroughfare a million of Filipinos march into the open doorway of the American Republic. More than that, 70,000,000 Americans march into the Philippine Islands as the Filipinos march here.

It is a marriage of nations. This twain become one flesh. They become bone of our bone and flesh of our flesh. Henceforth and forever, according to the terminology of this treaty, the Filipinos and Americans are one. I trust yet, Mr. President, that before this marriage is consummated the spirit of American constitutional liberty will arise and forbid the bans.

Mr. President, there is one characteristic of the speeches which have been delivered on this subject by those who favor the treaty and of the essays and editorials which doubtless has not escaped your observation. The issue joined in the debate has been too much joined upon a mere question of power. Who has told us what we are going to the Philippine Islands for? Who has told us what moral or legal compulsion we are under to go there?

Who has said what we are going to add to the general welfare, to the national defense, to the establishment of justice, or to the insurance of domestic tranquillity, or how or in what way we will attain by going there any of the great ends for which our Government was founded and our Constitution ordained? Upon these subjects there has been a general if not an absolute silence.

I shall speak, Mr. President, on this question solely from the standpoint of an American, a republican American, if you please, believing in republican doctrines and in republican institutions; a democratic American, if you please, believing in the right of this people and the right of all people to govern themselves. No obligation to any other nation, nay, no obligation to the Filipinos, however fanciful or however solid, should for a single instant disturb us from standing firmly and fixedly on this standpoint.

It is the American people who have got the first mortgage upon our diligent attention and loyalty to their interests, to their Constitution, to their principles; it is the American people who have got the preferred in anything that we may do or project concerning our national polity. We may have some obligations to others. They are secondary. But we have none which is not perfectly consistent with such amendment to this treaty as will preserve our national character and consummate perfectly the purposes for which the war was begun.

It is said that we can not leave the Filipinos in the hands of Spain. I agree to that. Our obligation is one of equity and is one of honor. But why leave the Filipinos in the hands of Spain? What have we to do with them and what is their relation to us that we should sally forth knightlike, with lance in hand, to do anything for or about them? It is a fact that the Filipinos helped us in our war with Spain. They became our comrades in the line of battle. The blood of the brown people of the Philippine Archipelago and the blood of the paleface from the great Northern Republic flowed in a common stream to cast off the odious and intolerable yoke of Spain.

The obligation that we owe to the Filipinos is the obligation of comradeship. It is the obligation of fraternity. It is not pecuniary; it is honorary. It comes under that class of obligations which has as its touchstone and its watchword noblesse oblige. Having accepted comradeship—call it ally, coadjutor, cooperator, or what not—having accepted the fact of friendship and clasped hands on the perilous edge of battle, we can not renounce the hand that we there clasped and treat the man or the men who gave us those hands otherwise than as friends. That is noblesse oblige.

What is it, Mr. President, if you strike the gun out of the hand in which you put the gun and aim the gun at the breast which touched elbow with your elbow when you went down to battle? What is that? I name it not, but it is not noblesse oblige. We can not leave the Filipinos in the hands of Spain. No, no, no. Americans can not so treat those who were their comrades.

What next? Recognize their independence as a nation? I say, "No." They have not yet made themselves an independent nation. We do not know whether they can or whether they will make themselves such a nation as can assume international obligations and maintain themselves in the great family of states. Recognize them and come away from the islands? No; we can not now come away from the islands. We need only look skyward to see that the birds of prey are circling around the Philippine Islands. We can neither leave them in the hands of Spain nor leave them to become the prey of the first vulture that sweeps upon them.

What next? The face of the treaty tells us how to treat them. Exactly as we have treated Cuba. We are now in military occupation of the Philippine Islands. Let us stay in military occupation of the Philippine Islands until such time as we know more about them than we do, until we have assisted them with our kind offices and with our national prestige and with our force of arms into such destiny as may fitly and justly await them, into such destiny as they have projected for themselves.

What is the difference between doing that, Mr. President, and ratifying this treaty? It is the difference between planting an empire there and maintaining the temporary ascendency of American power there.

The one thing, such as we have proposed and are doing in Cuba, is essentially transitory; it is ambulatory; it admits of a moment's change. The President of the United States, as the Commander in Chief of our armies, can withdraw in honor, in propriety, in justice the troops from Cuba whenever good sense and sound policy dictate. Why not leave him to do the same thing as to the Philippine Islands? With far more reason may we do that as to the Philippine Islands than with respect to Cuba.

Cuba is a natural part of the American continent. It has been, ever since we ourselves have been a nation, within the range and under the sphere of influence of the American Republic. As the Hon. Thomas Francis Bayard said when he was Secretary of State in the first Administration of Mr. Cleveland, we have established a protectorate over the Western World. It has always been and it is to-day under the wing of the people of the United States out of the necessity of our geographical situation. The Philippine Islands have never been and naturally can never so be. Why not, then, leave them in that situation in which we may determine our policy at leisure, studiously, sedately, with full comprehension of all those facts and conditions of which we now claim to know and of which we do know so little?

Mr. President, before we launch forth upon this great adventure I beg to call attention to the fact that as we stand to-day we are not only the most favored nation of the world, but occupy a position more favored by Providence than any nation that ever did exist in the history of the world since time began. Our situation is absolutely ideal; it is a natural fortification. Our coast is washed east and west by the everlasting seas, which have put up an impenetrable barrier against the aggression of any other nation. As Abraham Lincoln said in one of his speeches, we are so situated that all the armies of the universe, with Napoleon Bonaparte as their general, could never manage to take a drink of water out of the Ohio River.

We are in a natural and impregnable fortress which the God of nature has put around us. North of us are our own kin, a people who in their situation, so far from menacing us, constitute a bond to keep the peace unto themselves, and also make an additional bond to keep the peace with the great mother of nations from which they and we ourselves sprung. South of us are the Central and South American Republics. Of all of them we were the prototype and exemplar. They are the intellectual and moral children of the American brain; they are all friendly to us; they can not be otherwise.

Mr. President, we are about to build the Nicaragua Canal. I did not vote for the particular measure, not because I did not want the canal, for I believe in it, but in one way or another that canal is about to be built. It will chain together the armor of our national defense. After that canal shall have been built, we will not be like Achilles, we will be impregnable from the crown of our head to the sole of our feet, including the heel.

Every annexation we have ever made to the American commonwealth has been an annexation in contemplation of our Constitution and in symmetrical outline with the projections of nature—rivers, mountains, and seas, which are the great lawgivers to peoples.

They tell us that Jefferson was a great annexationist. So he was; but, expansionist as he was, he drew the line on expansion. He interpreted the oracles of nature, if indeed they needed interpretation, for their language is not oracular in the olden oracular sense. Cuba we want, he said, for it is an outpost of the Gulf of Mexico and the Caribbean Sea, but we want no annexation that will require a navy to defend it.

If we look introspectively, Mr. President, we find that this nation, having now established its ascendency on the wings of the republic in the Sandwich Islands and in Cuba and in Porto Rico, is a perfect, symmetrical body, becoming homogeneous in all its parts, dedicated to the principles of human liberty, which goes forth like a bridegroom from his chamber, rejoicing as a strong man to run a race. Annex the Philippine Islands to this country, and what is it then? Something beyond the boundaries indicated in its Constitution, something beyond any ideal that ever entered the dreams of our fathers, something that is cumbrous and unnatural, something that is heterogeneous and surprising, something that is amphibious, something that is half man and half fish, something that never would have been born in the natural course of human projection, something that is the haphazard chance of war, which we are asked to change into a permanent establishment.

Mr. President, when we contemplate the one hundred and twenty-five years of the history of the American Republic and the anterior years in which it was forming in these forests of America, we discern that there has been but one impediment to our national harmony and to our national growth. For that impediment the generation that founded this Republic and its successors were not responsible. They were the unwilling heirs of unwilling and protesting ancestors. The Dutch ship that landed at Jamestown bringing here another race brought also Pandora's box. The interjection of a race nonassimilable with the American people has been the fly in the ointment of American institutions, of American peace, of American history.

That interjection came from war and came from distant colonial establishments. The untutored black man in his native haunts was seized upon by war, was torn from the habitat for which nature had intended him, was put on board an alien ship by an alien people, and was brought here and sold. There is no tragedy in human history, Mr. President, so pitiable, and none, if it be justly contemplated, that is so instructive. There lies across the border of yonder stream an old Commonwealth upon which that tragedy inflicted its most terrific curse.

Twenty-seven times did the people of that Commonwealth protest through their legislative assemblies against the intrusion of this foreign and this alien mixture into their Commonwealth; but trade, the commercial spirit overriding the great liberty-loving principles of the British race, foisted them upon us with bayonets. The rest of the story I need not tell; but that one ingredient in the American commonwealth turned brother against brother, sowed the seeds of discord into that which otherwise would have been a perfect Union. Without that we were a homogeneous people.

Go into Maine or Louisiana; go into Tennessee or Massachusetts; go into Virginia or Ohio or Illinois, and the American people are like unto themselves, with the same ideas of government, with the same devoted and undying love of liberty, with the same sense of justice and of equity and of honor. This one thing poured "the sweet milk of concord into hell."

We are happily beginning, Mr. President, to adjust ourselves to the conditions and complications and infinite troubles that this one ancient crime brought down upon us. We are happily at peace with ourselves to-day throughout all this American nation, and I thank God I have lived to see this day. It matters not on which side a man fought in the civil war; he is devoted to-day to the flag of his country and to everything that that flag stands for. He honors and esteems the President of the United States not only with the naked loyalty that belongs to the dignity of his great office, but with that grateful esteem and with that open and honest admiration for great wisdom and public virtue and broad and enlightened patriotism and for sweet and gracious and friendly ways.

Now, Mr. President, at this moment, perfect in every defense, at peace with all the nations of the world, blessed with everything, and with more than everything, that any other nation was ever blessed with, we are challenged to go forth upon a great expedition, 7,000 miles away from our home, to lay the heavy hand of our sovereign power upon 8,000,000 people and introduce again into the American commonwealth the fatal and insidious element which came near being the cause of its destruction.

Mr. President, there is one thing that neither time nor education can change. You may change the leopard's spots, but you will never change the different qualities of the races which God has created in order that they may fulfill separate and distinct missions in the cultivation and civilization of the world. The Indian of one hundred and twenty-five years ago is the Indian of to-day—ameliorated, to a certain extent civilized, and yet the wisdom of our forefathers, when, in the Constitution, they set them apart as one people, separate and distinct from the great dominant race which had come to take this land and to inhabit it, is indicated in what we are still doing and must forever do with them so long as they maintain their tribal relations and so long as they are Indians. Racial differences, differences of religion, differences in mode of thought, differences in psychology, the subtle analyses of man have put them asunder.

Mr. President, apart from that, there are many objections to the treaty as it stands. It is objectionable from a military and strategic standpoint. It destroys the solidarity of this nation. It throws out an American salient far beyond any line of our natural or projected development. That salient will be the first point of attack in any plan of battle against this nation. We can no longer hug our native shores and bid the world defiance; we have flung our glove far down into the arena of the nations, and the first day that war is declared between this American Republic and any other great nation of the world the prow of the battle ship, with its mighty guns, will be turned toward the Philippine Islands.

What then? Anticipating that if we take the Philippines to-day we must commence to fortify them to-morrow. There are from 1,200 to 2,000 of those islands. The fortification of one island may not defend another. Siege guns have got to be put upon every harbor and around their cities, at an expense of millions upon millions of dollars. A separate navy has got to watch them and be ready to defend them.

Naturally enough, Mr. President, "birds of a feather flock together." The Philippine treaty and a great standing army walk into the halls of Congress hand in hand, one behind and close upon the heels of the other. In a military and strategic point of view no nation ever challenged fate by so unwise and unnecessary a step as to fling out an American salient upon the Asiatic coast and say, "Here is the place where we are willing to establish our sovereignty, and, if need be, to defend it against the world in arms." It means militarism to follow—its essential corollary, its necessary and its inevitable consequence.

The men who favor the standing army to-day have read in the lines of that treaty the bugle call "To arms! To arms!" They have seen with that treaty you can no more rely permanently and fixedly upon the American volunteer, the pride of the nation, the citizen soldier, ever ready to take his gun and go down to the shore to defend his native land; that you must have, if you are going there to maintain your sovereignty, a regular army; you must introduce the regular soldier into American life, and when he comes he will come with all the necessary consequences.

The American who has heretofore visited Europe has come back making a contrast between European nations and his own country which was infinitely reassuring and delightful. In no public place in Europe are you ever out of sight of a regular soldier. You will see the redcoat on every court green in Britain, at every theater, at every shop, on every highway—the man with a gun, ever ready to fight; the soldier of the nation whose gates in the temple of Janus are never closed, the nation which makes its living by war.

If you go to France, you see, with all her power of recovery after the invasion of Germany, she there has the regular soldier on the workman's bench, and the swish of the horsehair plume will be heard with the rustle of every dress. The French grenadier is a social and familiar picture in every domestic scene of life. We are apt to picture the great scenic phases of a nation, to point to their triumphs for their national character. The American would point to Manila Bay, or to Gettysburg Heights, or to Malvern Hill, or to Marye's Hill, or to some other place where American armies marched to death without flinching, and say, "Behold! there is what the American is!"

The greatest triumph, Mr. President, of the American nation was a silent and inconspicuous triumph. It was a triumph that was not heralded with the blast of the bugle nor decorated with the ornamental flag. It was the triumph of the American people when they laid down their arms in 1866 and dispersed, each man quietly to his workshop and to his fireside. North and South participated in that triumph.

Even men as wise as Grant and Sherman had said that when you disperse these Southern armies they will break up into bands; one band will infest a mountain fastness, another band will roam the plains, another band will go to the prairies, and for years after the civil war you will have rumors of strife and disagreeable incidents, and you will have to keep a standing army to meet with those incidental troubles that come in the aftermath of battle. There was no such trouble. The people of our race when they fight mean war, and when they surrender they surrender as flatly and as decisively and as utterly as any people who mean what they say and who believe that it is the truth which makes men free and not falsehood and not trifling with great concerns.

So the American people shook hands upon the battlefield, which both sides had illustrated with its splendid prowess and with its noble sacrifice. As General Grant fitly says in his Memoirs, "They shook hands as old friends who had been long parted, neither showing resentment." Why should they have shown resentment? War is not personal; it is a matter of principle; it is a matter of duty. There is no reason why the man who does the right as he sees the right may not look the world in the eye and grasp the honest hand of another man, however much he may have differed with him.

Now, Mr. President, I want to see that triumph repeated here. The war is done, in all its projected ideals and with all its natural and just consequences. Spain has vanished from the American continent. Cuba has been set free. It was a proud day for the American citizen; it was a day which made our hearts thrill with exceeding pride and joy when the American flag shot forth into the sky over the dungeon walls of Morro Castle, and the stars heard the message that a people had come who founded their domain not upon the sword, but upon human rights.

This is the only great Government in the world that laid a corner stone before it put up the foundation of the building. Other nations have been formed from the various circumstances which made men connect together for their mutual defense and interest and safety. They have grown through the long processes of time from various motives and incidents, but our birth was signalized by a peculiar thing, and that germ which we planted in the beginning of our institutions has grown and waxed and is to-day strong and mighty.

We founded a government upon the recognition of human rights—that is our distinction—the right of men to be free, the right of men to govern themselves; and no man in this Government to-day but feels that he has an immediate, an intimate, a close and undying tie between the highest of its officers, between the most solemn of its constitutions, between its judges, its legislators, and himself. It is his legislature; it is his Senate; it is his House of Representatives; it is his Constitution; it is his Declaration of Independence; it is his country, and he has his rights in that country, and that country gets back in return his allegiance and his love.

Mr. President, let us ask ourselves why we should annex the Philippine Islands. I spoke of the debt of equity and honor which we owed the Filipinos. It was a debt of friendship. Is the annexation of them against their will friendship? La Fontaine has a fable of which I am reminded by the proposition. There was a master once, he says, who had a favorite dog, and the dog was accustomed to bring the master his dinner in a basket. One day upon the street with the basket in his mouth going to his master's workshop he was beset by hungry curs. The basket was knocked out of his mouth and the victuals were spilled upon the ground, whereupon the dog, before he addressed himself to the hungry curs who were after him, commenced to gulp down the dinner. Just then the master appeared upon the scene and reproached the dog. He gave a most excellent excuse. "Why, my dear master," he says, "I was taking the dinner faithfully to you when these hungry curs jumped upon me, and as the dinner was spilled, I knew you would rather have your faithful dog to consume it than to fill up the mouths of these hungry curs."

Having been once friendly to the Filipinos, and seeing that, according to the way the world wags, some vulture is after them, we have concluded that since they have to be eaten up, they would rather have their good old American friend undertake the benevolent assimilation than to have any other persons undertake it. Mr. President, that was an exceedingly smart and philosophical dog. For dog logic I do not think he has ever been excelled; but upon my word, sir, I do not feel that, as smart as he was, I can yet agree to put him up instead of the American eagle, and accept the moral of his tale in place of the teachings of Thomas Jefferson and Daniel Webster and Abraham Lincoln, and all the great men who have guided the American people in their hours of emergency.

What do we want to go to the Philippines for, and what are we after, and where will we be any better or stronger or nobler or richer after we have gone? What is the temptation to us? Having told one fable, I find myself tempted to tell another. In the old times when there was transmigration of souls between the different types of animated nature, it is said that a cat found herself suddenly transformed into a beautiful lady. Nothing could have exceeded the charms of her person and nothing the propriety of her behavior. But one day, as she sat the picture of demure and enchanted beauty, a mouse chanced to run across the floor. She did not shriek, as perhaps some of her prototypes would have done, but she instantly jumped upon and devoured the mouse. The feline instinct was still there.

The American Republic set itself upon a different plan from the anterior nations. It said that all men are equal. There was the one word set like a diamond in the Declaration of Independence. It said, furthermore, all just governments derive their powers from the consent of the governed. It made a Constitution in which it put up bars of defense for the rights of man and for the rights of the community. It robed itself in the robes of liberty. It set the Goddess of Liberty over its Capitol. Nothing could exceed the beauty of its nobility or the wisdom of its design, and everything has gone well with us until this Philippine mouse has happened to run across the floor, and the old native instinct of taking something has broken loose in us again.

I think I heard a Senator say one day that all of our ancestors were pirates. I take no issue with him. The great prepotent family that has molded American institutions and has hewed out this massive and eternal stone of human liberty were descendants of the great northern races that put freedom in Great Britain, as far as it went, but it once rode the northern seas under the raven flag. But when they got here in this beautiful land, when they felt the pinch of ancient and distant tyranny controlling their affairs, they turned over a new leaf and adopted a set of good resolutions, and Providence aided them in the fulfillment of them as it had blessed no other people since time began.

But there is a chance to take somebody, there is a chance to get some more land, there is a chance to expand in mere material and numerical strength, to seem to be mightier, and the old instinct has jumped up again and the old appetite has broken out again, and a short-sighted policy is attempted to be placed upon us to override all that we have hitherto accomplished.

Mr. President, we are already beginning to get the Asiatic flavor in our American utterances. The people talk of destiny after the manner of the Orient, after the way of those who bow themselves to fate. We have also got a little of Spanish accent and vogue into our American manners. When we say settle this question now in your treaty, it is mañana, mañana; to-morrow, to-morrow.

More than this, I do not think any nation of the earth or the monarchical essays and pessimists of the world have ever run down the Declaration of Independence or the Constitution of the United States as much as I have heard it run down, belittled, and minified in the last few weeks under the influence of this debate. It seems now that it was not much of a Declaration after all. It seems now that it was not much of a Constitution after all. It seems now that there is no provision of it and no sentiment in it and no principle of it that can not be cheesepared away and can not have some nice sharp quillet of the law in a diplomatic way to let it down easily and dismiss it from our further consideration.

I never expected, Mr. President, to be called on to defend the Declaration of Independence in this Hall. I never expected to hear its phrases used as if they were airy nothings, rhetorical flourishes, empty vaporings of a revolutionary assemblage. I think that Abraham Lincoln has correctly expounded the Declaration of Independence, and I think in the great debate which he held with Judge Douglas when they were candidates for the Senate from Illinois that he met every phase of the argument which has here been adduced against it.

I think he defined it and interpreted it just as its immortal author meant it—Thomas Jefferson, the pioneer, the founder, the enunciator of a principle which has done more to mold American institutions, to swing them back into the right groove when they got wrong, than any other. He did not mean that men were equal in all respects, neither in stature nor in intellect, nor in moral character, nor in possession. What he meant was that they were equally entitled to liberty. When he spoke of all governments deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, he meant that the government of a people must derive its just powers from the consent of the people over whom the government was stretched and to which it applied.

It is literally true that it means the consent of some of the governed, not all. But according o republican and democratic institutions, a majority have a right to express the views of the community, and the consent of all is expressed in the sense of a majority of that government of whom they are the people. It does not imply that because a man is free he may necessarily vote. Our Constitution has dealt with that question. It has left it to the States, and in the nature of things the States must determine who shall vote.

The woman is as free as the man, but she does not vote. The boy 20 years of age is as free and may be wiser and stronger and better than the boy of 23, but one votes and the other does not. In the nature of things the sovereign body of the whole people, who are the majority acting for the entire commonwealth, must determine the degrees of ability—mental, moral, and physical—which are worthy of the deposit of that portion of the political power.

But whether or not the power to vote is possessed or dispossessed by reason of mental or moral weakness or sex or age or condition, all the citizens of a commonwealth that is free are themselves free, and all of them are equal in the enjoyment of their lives. Each of them has the same defense; all the liberty. Each of them has the same protection and in the pursuit of happiness under just and equal laws, which is the possession of each and every one. That is what the Declaration of Independence means. That is the manner in which every State in this Union has interpreted it. That is the way in which it is accepted in Territory and State alike.

But it is said, Mr. President, that with respect to Porto Rico we have one idea and with respect to the Philippine Islands another. Gentlemen who are opposed to the propositions which I am maintaining say that you went to Porto Rico by force of arms. You dispossessed the sovereignty of Spain. You accepted sovereignty from Spain. You have established yourselves upon that island without asking the consent of the governed and without any regard to your Declaration of Independence.

I make two answers to their proposition. In the first place, I say that naturally the two places are different. Porto Rico is an outpost of the American commonwealth. It is under the jurisdiction of our Monroe law, which is as much a law as if it were in our written Constitution. It is essential to our defense and self-defense. The first law of nature is the inherent attribute of a free State as much as of any other.

Furthermore, I say that the people of Porto Rico have made no objection to our sovereignty. They have not established another government, as the Filipinos have done. They have not raised another revolution, as the Filipinos have done. They have not asked us not to annex them, as the Filipinos have done. While the matter does not rest in the evidence of documents, yet according to our general and public information they welcomed the American flag. They accepted us with outstretched arms. But be that as it may, all rules have some exceptions. Political truths, however clear, however pure, however well defined, can not move with the accuracy of a mathematical equation nor with the symmetry of the starry motions above. Mr. Lincoln answered this objection, made in another case, to the Declaration of Independence:

> It may be argued that there are certain conditions that make necessities and impose them upon us, and to the extent that a necessity is imposed upon a man he must submit to it. I think that was the condition in which we found ourselves when we established this Government. We had slaves amongst us. We could not get our Constitution unless we permitted them to remain in slavery. We could not secure the good we did secure if we grasped for more; and having of necessity submitted to that much, it does not destroy the principle that is the charter of our liberties. Let that charter stand as our standard.

So I say with respect to Porto Rico. While the logic may not be justified by the facts, assume that it was the fact that the Porto Ricans did not want us. It is a necessity of the American Republic. We can not help ourselves. The God of nature, who put that island upon our shore, made it a natural outpost of our own defense.

A captain of artillery that carries his battery over a field or demolishes a house in order to get at the enemy does not destroy the private property that he occupies for the emergency in contempt of any of the rights of man. He does it not because he wants to, not that it may not wound his feelings, not that it may not be against his natural instincts and principle, but because the necessity of defense is upon him, and he must.

Mr. President, it is often in the path of the most noble and gracious nations, those of the highest conception, that they must sometimes break their models. They can not help it. They live in a world of trouble. They are surrounded by the difficult circumstances and situations and complexions of war, pestilence, famine, and invasion. They must do not the best that is conceivable, not the best that some dreamer in his closet might bring up to himself in some sweet imagination, but the best that that case and those conditions admit of.

This we have done with respect to Porto Rico. We can not let another nation take her. That is as old as the Monroe doctrine. We were obliged to drive the Spanish out of her in order to consummate a righteous war. In the nature of things, the sovereignty was devolved upon us by the law of nature and of nations.

But how is it as to the Filipinos? Is there any necessity there? Is there any necessity for our taking the Philippine Islands? It is a necessity which no man has mentioned. If there is any sound policy and wise judgment in establishing our sovereignty there in contradistinction to our temporary occupancy, no man has disclosed that policy or made known his confidential views.

Aye, Mr. President, through many of the speeches of those who say "Ratify the treaty" there runs a sense of distrust of what they are doing; there runs a sense of preference for what we propose to do. They say, "Ratify the treaty now; come and we will talk about policy to-morrow."

The policy is wrapped up in the treaty. The policy is determined by the treaty. The policy that will follow is a mere minor detail. If you have military occupancy there, as you have in Cuba, you may fold your tents like the Arab and quietly steal away, or sail away, or march away, or get away any night or morning that you please.

It is not a question of hauling down the flag. The flag now is a mere casual visitor there. It is no more fixed there than it is fixed in Pennsylvania avenue when it sweeps down at the head of a regiment. It merely waves there over a ship and where it is carried by an American soldier. But once fix sovereignty there and its roots go down to the center of the earth like a fee-simple deed, and its stars go upward until they mingle with those in space. It is sovereignty, the most permanent act of human life, the most fixed and immovable thing that ever nation did or could do.

And what excuse is there for it? I wish to quote with accuracy some of the gentlemen who have so earnestly advocated this treaty. We are told that we are bound up in certain alternatives; that this is the least injurious alternative; not that they want it; they deprecate it; but they submit to it, so to speak, against their judgment and against their will as a thing per se, and hope to-morrow we will rectify any trouble or any wrong or any mischief which we may make.

Peace, it is said, is in this treaty; peace—a pleasing name to conjure with. "Blessed are the peacemakers." Are our friends upon the other side sure that this treaty means peace? Are they sure that the spoken word will be substantiated by subsequent facts? Undoubtedly it means peace with Spain. There is nothing else in the future but peace with Spain. There is no contingency that can revive war with Spain. There is nothing that we would do with this treaty that can affect Spain.

Ah, but amend it, they say, and you delay. We are acting for all time, Mr. President. We are acting for immortality, not for a few days or a few weeks or a few months. Aye, would a few years be a long vestibule to that infinite stretch of time that goes with sovereignty?

But this treaty is easily amended. You have only to substitute in respect to the Philippine Islands what you have done as to Cuba, and it is done. If there are votes here to do that, it can be done next Monday. Do you think Spain will not consent? Why do you think so? There is nothing in the nature of things from which any man can fancy that Spain would not readily assent. She has done so in one case with respect to Cuba, and she did it there simply because we asked it. Aye, Mr. President, she did it in Cuba against her wishes. She wanted us to annex Cuba on account of her Spanish citizens there, for she thought that the Spaniards there and the Spanish soldiers there and the Spanish property there would all be safer and better under the permanent sovereignty of the United States than in the chance medley of military occupation with Cuban independence hovering over it. But against the wishes of Spain we said, "No; we prefer only a military occupation here."

Now, Mr. President, if Spain assented to our wishes in that regard, why not us to the other? If she assented to our wishes with respect to a state lying upon our shores, with which we have a natural affinity, a manifest and inevitable destiny of close communion, why would she not also have assented to our suggestion with respect to the Philippine Islands?

But suppose she does not like it. We did not go into this war for the pleasure and satisfaction of Spain. We went into it much against her liking, and we should not cease this war until we have registered our will, and not the Spanish will, upon the subject-matters with which we have to deal. She could have no sensible, reasonable, justifiable, or even plausible objection.

Some gentlemen have said that there is the same thing in the relinquishment of sovereignty and in the cession of territory. Mr. President, there is as much difference between them as there is between a hawk and a handsaw. The cession of sovereignty is a contract and a grant between two parties. The ceding sovereign is the grantor; the grantee sovereign accepts it, and there is a mutual and interchangeable obligation and fixity of relation between them. A relinquishment is a one-sided affair, that is to say, with respect to the obligations it creates, not with respect to the obligations which it exerts and fulfills.

It is mere letting go upon the one side without the undertaking of any peculiar relation or obligation upon the other except what it sees fit to undertake, and that this was perfectly understood is illustrated in the note of our American commissioners at Paris, who, addressing the Spanish commissioners, set forth to them that perfect understanding of the difference between relinquishment and a cession, with a quotation of learned authorities finding the distinctions between them. But, Mr. President, the most ordinary mind can comprehend them.

If Spain relinquishes her authority to us it leaves us free-handed and unbound to do as we please with respect to the Philippine Islands. It does not bind us and obligate us to her to put our sovereignty there to stay. It leaves our generals and our troops there; it leaves the President of the United States here, and, as in other cases of annexation, in Florida, in Mexico, and in numerous instances which are familiar in all the writings of our international and constitutional writers, a relinquishment would leave us as master of the situation, with no one to dictate to us, with no one to be bound to, but with America to work out her own will according to the pleasure of the Senate and of the House of Representatives hereafter.

Now, Mr. President, I think that some of our learned friends upon the other side have misconceived and have misstated this case. I think the journals of the country have misconceived and have misstated it. I will read a paragraph from a very intelligent editorial in the Hartford Courant, where it sums up this case to its readers:

There are some things—

Says this writer—

There are some things the ratification of the treaty will not do. It will not make the Philippines a part of the United States. It will not extend the Constitution of the United States over those islands. It will not make the Filipinos American citizens and electors. It will give them no opportunity which they did not enjoy just as fully this time last year to compete with American workingmen in the labor market, nor will it let in their products free of duty to compete with American products. The ratification of the treaty will leave them outside the Constitution, outside the tariff, outside the immigration laws. It will not enable them to scramble over or crawl under. We may add, for the more effectual reassurement of some excessively alarmed orators, that it will not in the least affect the difference between the Philippine climate and the American climate, nor shorten by a single marine league the distance from Manila to New York.

It will not, Mr. President; I admit that, and that is one reason why I am opposed to the treaty. The climate is one which Americans can never colonize. We speak of establishing a Philippine colony. We will do more in the Philippines than Great Britain in more than a hundred years has been able to do in India. There is no British colony there except in the most paltry and insignificant sense of the word. Not 3 per cent yet are British people. You can not establish any American colony in the Philippine Islands. The colony would perish.

You can not carry the American people to the Philippine Islands. The people who live there can not have the qualities, physical, moral, or intellectual, that Americans possess. It is not a colony that we propose to establish; it is a dependency, a perpetual dependency, an eternal serfdom, a species of national and international slavery modeled after the Russian pattern, in which the slave goes with the land.

Mr. President, this writer is mistaken in every one of his legal propositions, according to the Constitution of the United States, to the opinion of our jurists and publicists that have written thereon, to the decisions of the United States Supreme Court that have adjudicated thereon, to the natural and inborn principles of American liberty which we all possess.

The Philippine Islands will become a part of the United States the moment that the treaty is ratified. The Constitution of the United States will extend over them the moment that it is ratified. It will make the Filipinos American citizens, though not electors—I admit the electoral proposition—as soon as it is ratified. It will give them an opportunity immediate, instant, that they did not enjoy this time last year or any year before, to compete with American workingmen in the labor market. It will let in their products free of duty to compete with American products just as soon as Congress has performed its constitutional mandate and its sworn duty to extend the actual application of the laws to them.

The ratification of the treaty will not leave them outside of the Constitution. It will enable them to scramble over or crawl under or get in, any way that they please to come in. It will nullify our immigration laws against alien labor. It will nullify our immigration laws against all the races of the East who are at present prohibited from coming here. It will put the goods and manufactures and products of the Philippine Islands and all of its workmen into competition with those of the American workmen.

Now, Mr. President, why do I say this? It is because the American Constitution is a free Constitution. It is because it has constantly been getting freer and freer. It is because our decisions have fully interpreted and because our statutes have enacted legislation in behalf of all who may come in our jurisdiction. It stands at the gate waiting and ready to present them with these rights and privileges as soon as the treaty puts them in. It will not require a special act of Congress, because Congress has enacted by anticipation for all who come within our jurisdiction.

I will read three sections, page 347, of the Revised Statutes of the United States, sections 1977, 1978, and 1979. But before I read them I wish to make one observation.

Suppose that the ratification of this treaty did leave the Philippine Islanders in this degraded and extra-constitutional condition. Suppose it left them with no rights that an American Senator was bound to respect and applied to them in the most contemptuous manner that sentence which the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] told us the other day was such a scar upon American jurisprudence; do we want any such people in the American commonwealth? There was no sentence which was uttered about our civil war which probed down deeper into the nature of things or more illuminated our then unhappy condition than the sentence which Abraham Lincoln uttered in his New York speech, when he said that this Republic could not remain half free and half slave.

Mr. President, this Republic can not remain, nor by my will can it be created, half free and half dependent. In the nature of things, the Philippine Islands will never be fitted to become American States. Their race forbids it; their climate forbids it; their conditions in all respects forbid it. Therefore, if the gentlemen who deny them constitutional rights can have their way, it is for the creation of a perpetual dependency, of an absolute despotism annexed to a Republic, that they are seeking.

I know not in what attitude the presentation of the Philippine argument is most repulsive. I know not which form of presentation of it is more obnoxious to our people and our institutions. If they are unfitted for liberty and you propose to deny to them the right to a free constitution and to be a free people, you have to raise in your midst a lot of Egyptian taskmasters and satraps, proconsuls, governors-general, intendentes; and you march forth with this treaty not only to take the Spanish shoe as the master of the Philippine Islands, but to adopt the Spanish policy for their government.

I know, Mr. President, from the superior character and experience of the American people, that they are a humane people. I know that they are noble and high-minded, and that in no situation on the earth will they ever become so cruel, so corrupt, or so disregardful of the rights of man as their Spanish prototypes. But I know this also: That they turn their faces the downward way.

I know also, Mr. President, if the history of the world has left any lessons for our guidance, that when you raise great standing armies, when you have vast commerce, when you appoint governors-general, when you make profitable employments for men whom you set as taskmasters over others, in the nature of things, by the inevitable tendencies and inclinations of human nature, you set up a great establishment in which there is every incitement of ambition and wealth for its perpetuity, and that those who share in its honors, in its emoluments, in its profits, however honorably, will be disposed to a continuance of a condition of things which is to their profit. It may be that we will do better than any other nation has ever done; I know we will do better than Spain; but at its best it is a most perilous relation; it is a most injurious relation; it is a relation that all should pray against who have ever felt the power of that prayer, "Lead us not into temptation."

Mr. President, I want to read an authority from our Supreme Court to which, I believe, attention has not yet been called. It is with respect to our Territories. A Territory of the United States is just as much a part of it as any foot of soil in it. A citizen or inhabitant of a Territory, with permanent residence therein, is just as much a citizen of the United States as the President of the United States or any Senator here. It is true, the limit of his prerogatives may be curtailed by the conditions of his environment, but the Territory is a part of the Union and the man is a citizen of the Union.

Nay, Mr. President, in international transactions and to the outer world a Territory or district of the United States is undistinguishable from a State. This was decided by our Supreme Court in the case of De Geofroy vs. Riggs. The decision is to be found in 133 United States Reports, page 642. It was a discussion of our treaty with France of 1800, in which we had accorded to French citizens certain rights in the United States. The question arose whether or not a Territory of the United States was a State within the contemplation of that treaty. The Supreme Court said that it was. Judge Field, giving the opinion, said respecting the particular articles of the treaty which he was considering:

> This article is not happily drawn. It leaves in doubt what is meant by "States of the Union." Ordinarily these terms would be held to apply to those political communities exercising various attributes of sovereignty which compose the United States, as distinguished from the organized municipalities known as Territories and the District of Columbia. And yet separate communities, with an independent local government, are often described as States, though the extent of their political sovereignty be limited by relations to a more general government or to other countries. (Halleck on International Law, chapter 3, sections 5, 6, 7.)
> The term is used in general jurisprudence and by writers on public law as denoting organized political societies with an established government. Within this definition the District of Columbia, under the Government of the United States, is as much a State as any of those political communities which compose the United States. Were there no other territory under the Government of the United States, it would not be questioned that the District of Columbia would be a State within the meaning of international law; and it is not perceived that it is any less a State within that meaning because other States and other territory are also under the same Government.

Mr. President, by this treaty there occurs what the international law writers call a collective naturalization of all the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands as American citizens, and to them attach instantly all those personal rights and immunities which belong to American citizens. What are those rights, privileges, and immunities? I have collected, Mr. President, our constitutional provisions respecting citizenship. It will be seen, and clearly seen, from their perusal and interpretation that instantly the Filipinos are made American citizens. Our constitutional provisions on the subject of citizenship are as follows:

First, section 2, Article IV:

> The citizens of each State shall be entitled to all privileges and immunities of citizens in the several States.

That applies to the citizens of the Territories as well as to the citizens of those communities which are technically called States in our Constitution. The right to vote is not a privilege and immunity of American citizenship. This was decided in the case of Minor vs. Happersett, in 21 Wallace, which showed that the right to vote was a matter which rested within the prerogative of the State; but the other rights, all the rights of commerce, of transportation, of property, of buying and selling, exchanging, apply as well to a citizen of a Territory as to a citizen of a State under the decision which I have just read from the Supreme Court with respect to a Territory being considered as a State for certain purposes and in certain effects and intents.

Then comes this provision in section 3, Article IV:

> The Congress shall have power to dispose of and make all needful rules and regulations respecting the territory or other property belonging to the United States.

Territory in that sense seems to have referred to the actual, physical territory which the United States owns, not only by eminent domain, but by immediate, actual fee-simple title. Certainly it did not apply to enabling the United States to take away any of the muniments and privileges of American citizens, but only applied to those rules and regulations respecting the actual property of the United States, and by extension of interpretation with respect to the government of that property, over that territory of which the United States was the immediate sovereign.

Then, Mr. President, we have Article XIV, section 1:

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States—

Certainly, Mr. President, all persons born under annexation would come within the immediate language of this clause—

> All persons born or naturalized in the United States, and subject to the jurisdiction thereof, are citizens of the United States and of the State wherein they reside. No State shall make or enforce any law which shall abridge the privileges or immunities of citizens of the United States; nor shall any State deprive any person of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor deny to any person within its jurisdiction the equal protection of the laws.

Then comes Article XV:

> The right of citizens of the United States to vote shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or by any State on account of race, color, or previous condition of servitude.

Without the amendment of that clause in the Constitution, Article XV, if the Congress of the United States hereafter should choose, after annexing the Philippine Islands, to give the right to vote to a portion of its intelligent population, it is obliged to make no distinction on account of race or color, and the Tagalos, the Negritos, and all the various inferior tribes of that country have got to be considered with respect to race and color on the same basis and to the same intent and purpose as a white-born American citizen.

So much for the language of the Constitution. There is a principle of international law which applies to its construction. It is true that Congress may enact a uniform system of naturalization for foreigners, but there is no method of naturalizing one who owes allegiance to the country, and who by a priori act has been made a citizen. By international law, well known, interpreted by our courts, fixed and settled, the annexation of the territory is what is called a collective naturalization of its people. It puts them within the jurisdiction of the United States.

I will read on that subject the opinion of a distinguished jurist whose legal opinions have always been greatly respected not only in this Hall, but throughout the country. He was once chairman of the Judiciary Committee of this body—the Hon. George F. Edmunds, of Vermont. He states that—

All the people of these islands who were the subjects of Spain will become citizens of the United States by the mere act of cession unless the treaty of cession should provide that those who wished could remain subjects of Spain and aliens as to the United States. This has been a necessary rule of international law for hundreds of years; and the rule is founded upon the obvious fact that the people of every country, or of any part of it, must owe allegiance to and be subject to the government of some sovereign power, be it a tribe, or emperor, or king, or republic, and must, unless they are slaves or serfs, have the rights of such.

But a republic can have no subjects. Its people must be either citizens, slaves, or aliens.

If aliens, they are the subjects or citizens of some other power which is bound to protect them. The transfer, therefore, of the sovereignty of Spain over the Philippines to the United States makes all her subjects at once citizens of the United States.

If citizens of the United States, they have all the rights that belong to other citizens in the Territories, whether on the mainland or on islands of the sea. Neither geography nor distance has anything to do with it.

Nay, Mr. President, looking beyond this deliberate and learned opinion of an able constitutional jurist, we will see that the treaty itself acquiesces in this interpretation of international law. It assumes that the great body of the Philippine people are created by its passage as American citizens, and it provides for those who do not wish to become so maintaining their allegiance to the Spanish Government under certain conditions which it prescribes.

I read a little from the case of Pollard vs. Hagan, in 3 Howard, page 312:

It can not be admitted that the King of Spain could, by treaty or otherwise, impart to the United States any of his royal prerogatives; and much less can it be admitted that they have capacity to receive or power to exercise them. Every nation acquiring territory, by treaty or otherwise, must hold it subject to the constitution and laws of its own government.

Again, I read from the case of the United States vs. Wong Kim Ark (169 U. S. Reports, 705):

Congress has no authority "to restrict the effect of birth, declared by the Constitution to constitute a sufficient and complete right to citizenship."

Again, I read from Crandall vs. Nevada (6 Wallace, 35):

All citizens of the United States have the right to enter its seaports, to pass freely from one part of its territory to another, and to reside in any State.

The whole Philippine population, if they wish to, can come freely to any part of the United States and locate anywhere in the United States. They can bring their goods with them, and they are unamenable to any tax law of the United States, unless it be the temporary order of military authority in its course of being supervened by the civil power of the United States.

By the annexation of territory—

Says Chief Justice Marshall—

the relations of the inhabitants with their former sovereign are dissolved, and new relations are created between them and the government which has acquired their territory. The same act which transfers the territory transfers the allegiance of those who remain in it. (American Ins. Co. vs. Canter, 1 Peters, 542.)

Mr. President, it has been intimated that we can make any sort of tariff for these people. It has been time and again decided by the Supreme Court of the United States that as allegiance is created in the citizen to the Government, and the protection of the Government is extended to the citizen by the act which creates sovereignty, that then and there he becomes entitled to be governed by the same uniform laws with respect to taxation and everything else as any other citizen.

I do not lose sight of the fact that there may be an intervening stage in which civil authority may be withheld until military authority has passed, but that military occupancy is essentially transient. The moment the cession is made the decree of its cessation has been pronounced.

The moment of cession is the moment of constitutional accession, and with constitutional accession it becomes the solemn and sworn duty of Congress to provide equal laws to extend these equal immunities, to secure these equal privileges; and there can be no construction favorable to any idea which has been maintained by gentlemen who declare that the people of these territories will not succeed to the rights of American citizens except in the supposition that Congress will act in fraud of their sworn duty; that they will refuse to obey the instrument which they have sworn to support; that they will make a mockery and scorn of American institutions, and, by mere arbitrary power, sit in their seats and withhold the law which they have sworn to create, and refuse the protection and immunity which it is their duty to extend.

This, Mr. President, is what gentlemen mean who are learned and skilled in knowledge of the Constitution when they say that the Constitution does not immediately extend all rights, privileges, and immunities. The Constitution presumes a physical instrument to execute it; it presumes an honorable, honest, and conscientious instrument; and their construction is only justifiable and warrantable upon the assumption that Congress will turn its back upon the Constitution and refuse to execute its sworn duty.

In two cases, Mr. President, before the Supreme Court of the United States this question has been decided. One of these cases is the case of Loughborough vs. Blake, to be found in 5 Wheaton, which was a tax case. It involved direct taxation by the United States, and the question arose whether or not a district of the United States was a State in that sense and in the Union in that sense that the direct-tax provision of the Constitution applied to it. Chief Justice Marshall said that it was held that uniformity of tax law applying as to other States applied to the District of Columbia, and that the state of the District of Columbia or the Territories west of the Missouri River were just as much a part of the United States in the sense of the Constitution as any State in the Union.

Another was the case in 16 Howard. It is the case of Cross et al. vs. Harrison, in which the question of tariff laws as applicable to California arose. In that case the Supreme Court showed the difference between military occupancy and sovereignty. It showed that during the military occupancy the military commander, under the President of the United States, might prescribe such duties as he saw fit. That was under the right of the strong hand, a de facto government, the only government that was there; but the moment that civil power supervened and cession took place, it became the duty of Congress to establish a collection district in California, and the moment that it established the agency for the collection of revenue, uniform and equal laws attached as to every other port and every other place in the United States.

Let us not deceive ourselves, Mr. President, about this treaty. Let us not try to deceive any portion of the American people about this treaty. If we are going to take the Philippine Islands, and if a treaty is to be enacted, let us contemplate beforehand exactly what it means, and assume and honorably bear its inevitable consequences. It means the utter destruction of all tariff laws if Congress shall do its duty between the Filipinos and us; it means the utter abrogation of all immigration laws between the Filipinos and us, and the Chinese, the Japanese, the Tagalos, the Negritos, and all the curious and nondescript tribes of the Philippines, with all that they produce in those islands, and with all that their cheap labor may manufacture in those islands, established by greed and foreordained by this treaty to come into the market places and the marts of the United States on exactly the same basis, under the same protection, and with all the benefits which accrue to all American workmen of any race, of any State, or of any Territory.

I would add, Mr. President, to the decisions which I have read a few more, which I deem it scarce necessary to read, but I will add to the authorities which I have quoted one from Cooley on the Constitution, a decision of Judge Washington in 4 Washington Circuit Court Reports, which is generally accepted and taken by text writers and jurists as an exposition of what is meant by the privileges and immunities of citizens of the United States. He says:

They may all be comprehended under the following general heads: Protection of the Government; the enjoying of life and liberty; the right to acquire and possess property of every kind and to pursue and obtain happiness in safety, subject nevertheless to such restraints as the Government may justly prescribe for the general good of the whole; the right of the citizen of one State to pass through or to reside in another State for the purposes of trade, agriculture, professional pursuits, or otherwise; to claim the benefit of the writ of habeas corpus; to institute and maintain actions of every kind in the courts of the States; to take, hold, and dispose of property, either real or personal; an exemption from higher taxes or imposts than are paid by the citizens of the other States may be mentioned as some of the particular privileges and immunities of citizens which are clearly expressed by the general description of privileges deemed to be fundamental.

It is true, Mr. President, that this treaty reserves the right of Congress to declare the civil rights and political status of these people; but it is also true that Congress in declaring those civil rights and that political status is bound by the Constitution to recognize these fundamental rights, immunities, and privileges, and it can make no definition of civil rights, it can make no declaration of political status, that is not within the lines of that Constitution and of these limitations as they have been recognized and expounded.

Mr. President, to recur now to the statute, Congress has already legislated upon this subject. It has provided in anticipation what shall be the rights and what are the rights of the occupants and inhabitants of our territory; and I read these sections:

SEC. 1977. All persons within the jurisdiction of the United States shall have the same right in every State and Territory to make and enforce contracts, to sue, be parties, give evidence, and to the full and equal benefit of all laws and proceedings for the security of persons and property as is enjoyed by white citizens, and shall be subject to like punishment, pains, penalties, taxes, licenses, and exactions of every kind, and to no other.

There is one section applicable to personal rights. Now the next section:

SEC. 1978. All citizens of the United States shall have the same right, in every State and Territory, as is enjoyed by white citizens thereof to inherit, purchase, lease, sell, hold, and convey real and personal property.

Then there is still another section:

SEC. 1979. Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress.

Here, then, Mr. President, Congress has already by anticipation fixed its policy as to citizens. It has already put the Filipino upon the plane of any other American citizen. It has already interpreted the clauses of the Constitution which operate upon it, and the very moment that the assent of the Senate of the United States goes to the treaty, the moment the bars are down, the gates are opened and the Filipino walks under the protection of that statute and can say, if he will, as proudly as any of us, "I, too, am an American citizen, and claim the right of the road and the freedom of the mart and all the privileges, rights, and immunities which attach to me as such."

Now, Mr. President, if we are to have these people, let us have a little understanding of whom they are. We do not know much. I know, probably, as little as any, but I have tried to find out by hasty perusal of encyclopedias, magazines, newspaper articles, and so forth——

Mr. MASON. If the Senator is going to leave this branch of the question, I wish to call his attention to a point.

The statute which the Senator has cited clearly gives the right to any person within the jurisdiction of the United States to come into any State or Territory. In answer to my suggestion some of the Senators have said that it was a mere statute and could be repealed by the treaty. Is there anything in the treaty that attempts to repeal that statute?

Mr. DANIEL. Not a thing, or an intimation of it.

Mr. MASON. Then, in order to repeal the statute which the Senator has just cited there must be, in addition to the treaty, an act of Congress, or otherwise the inhabitants of the islands come in not only by the Senator's construction of the Constitution, but by the statute itself.

Mr. DANIEL. I so understand.

Mr. President, if that statute did not exist ready-made, applying to the Filipinos eo instanti, we would be obliged by the Constitution immediately to make it. Instead of acquiring by the treaty any suggestion or right to repeal it, we would come under the most solemn adjuration that man can live under to enact it.

Mr. President, would any benefit of trade compensate us for this great change in our national life and this organic change in our institutions? If there be any underlying incentive that has not been fully exploited with respect to this treaty, it must be that we are going to get some trade benefit from it. We will get a place to build railroads, perhaps, though there are a great many good openings for railroads yet remaining in this country. We will have an enlarged market for our wares, it may be suggested. On this line I beg to read a line from a pamphlet called "The Colonial Systems of the World," which has just been issued by our own Government, compiled by Mr. O. P. Austin:

Commerce between the successful colonies and their mother countries is in nearly all cases placed upon practically the same basis as that with other countries, goods from the home countries receiving in the vast majority of cases no advantages over those from other countries in import duties or other exactions of this character affecting commerce. In the more prosperous and progressive colonies, the percentage of importations from the mother countries grows somewhat less as the business and prosperity increase.

The chief British colonies in North America (Canada and Newfoundland), which in 1871 took 50 per cent of their importations from the home country, took in 1896 less than 30 per cent from the United Kingdom; those of South Africa (Cape Colony and Natal), which in 1871 took 83 per cent from the home country, took but 71 per cent in 1896; those of Australia and the adjacent islands, which in 1876 took 48 per cent from the home country, in 1896 took but 40 per cent. The French colonies now take from the home country about 42 per cent of their total imports, while the British colonies obtain about 40 per cent of their total imports from the home country.

This shows, Mr. President, that the exploitation of colonies for the purpose of monopolizing trade is a vanishing quantity in the civilization of the world; and in the last two or three decades even, in the colonies of Great Britain and France, which those great nations have cultivated and tried to build up as subsidiary to their home markets, the proportion of goods that they have bought from the mother country has been a constantly diminishing quantity. So I say, under the conditions which we at present find the colonizing exploitation schemes of the world's aggressive aggrandizement, they are not in that attitude to tempt us to go there for the purposes of trade.

There is another fact with respect to our own trade which is equally significant as indicative of what should be our true policy. It is not necessary to own a man in order to sell something to him. It may be very convenient to catch a fellow and tie him down, to build a tariff fortification on one side and an internal-revenue fortification on the other, and then say, "Buy this and give me that." It is a scheme which is outworked in the world's progress. It is no longer necessary to buy a man and tie him and hold him and compel him to trade with you. Neither is it necessary to exercise suzerainty after Turkish or Spanish or English or any other fashion in order to trade with people.

With whom to-day is our largest and most profitable trade? From whom do we derive the largest balance that goes into our coffers? From whom do we receive the largest sums for our agricultural products or for our many articles of manufacture which are now possessing the earth, not by colonization, not by the sovereignty of our Government, but which are now conquering the earth and subduing nations to pay tribute to us through the excellence of American workingmen and the cheapness of American products, brought forth by skilled labor, challenging the world to competition? It is Great Britain. She is our first benefactor in the way of trade.

Yet, strange to say, we have not a single strategic island at the mouth of Liverpool Harbor. We have not built a single American castle, after the pattern of Morro, upon the bank of the Thames. At Portsmouth and Southampton and Dover, and at all the other ports of England, our flag comes and goes, and the merchantmen deliver our goods and bring back what we want, and there is no American soldier there, there is no American gun there, there is no Philippine island there, there is no Hawaiian island there, there is nothing there except the superiority of American goods and the Englishman with his money who wants to buy them.

The time has passed in the history of the world when you have to blow your way to trade by dynamite. The time has passed in the history of the world, even in China, when you can build Chinese walls around nations. They say we want to go to the Philippines to open the door of the East. That is progress. Yet others say that when we get in the Philippines to open the door of the East they want to trim down the Declaration of Independence.

They want to viscerate the Constitution of the United States; they want to revise and correct the judicial decisions of Marshall and Taney; they want to upset the Supreme Court, and they want to repeal the free statutes of an American Congress, so as to shut the door behind the Philippines and build an inner wall to keep them from communicating and trading with us. To this complexion we have come at last, so incongruous, so heterogeneous, so contradictory of all we have been and all that we ought to be. We are breaking down our history, repudiating and belittling our principles, and seeking to subvert the whole theory and settled tenure of American progress and of American rule, just to get and embody in our commonwealth some scattered, barbarous, or savage islands and peoples of a mixed and nondescript race.

Mr. President, I desire to insert here from the Democratic Magazine for January, 1899, a summary of who these new Americans are. It is a compilation summarized from the books and papers which have recently been written upon the subject. In the first place, we are to have 25,000 Negritos, aborigines. They have no fixed occupation. They are American citizens, or will be, out of a job, but ready for one. They are dwarfish as a rule, 4 feet 8 inches in average height; negroid features, hair, and color; tattooed; nearly naked. Their religion is pagan.

In the next place, we have 3,000,000 Tagals and 2,500,000 Visayos. They are Catholic. They are field hands, day laborers, servants, agriculturists, small traders. They are tall and well formed, round head, flat nose, low brow, large dark eyes.

Then we have the Moros, of whom there are 300,000. They are Mohammedans. They are agriculturists, hunters, and fishers, and our noble cod is in danger, for they will fish and fish and their fish will come here in competition with our fish. They are tall and strong, scantily clothed, rather savage-featured.

Then come the Igorrotes. They are pagan. There are 500,000 of them. They live in the mountainous districts. They are dirty and repulsive in appearance, industrious, monogamists, distinct from Malays and Negritos. They are probably of Japanese origin. Then come scattered tribes, 2,000,000, mixed (pagan, Catholic, Mohammedan) altogether. They are found throughout the archipelago. They are hunters, fishers, small agriculturists; varying, some closely resembling Negritos, others equal to Tagals.

Then we have the Spanish, 10,000. Three hundred years of colonization and only 10,000 Spaniards there! How long would it be before there are 10,000 Americans there? There are only a handful now. There are only 200 Englishmen in the city of Manila. The people of our race only touch at the Philippine Islands, and it is touch and go. They stop to have a transaction or to direct a transaction, and as one of our Eastern States was said to be a most excellent State to emigrate from, the Philippine Islands are considered by all civilized nations whose people have ever been there as a most excellent place to get away from, and as quickly as possible, and they have all got away from there. Even to-day, after three hundred years of occupation, only 10,000 Spaniards have located there.

Then come the Spanish Mestizos, descendants of Spanish fathers and native mothers, 50,000, Catholic. Then come the Chinese, 200,000, Buddhists. They are in every city and town. John Chinaman is everywhere, with his cheap laundry and his cheap transactions in various things. In every city and town he is located. They are merchants, tradesmen, laborers. Every community of any size has its Chinese quota. They are hated by Spaniards and heavily taxed, but they are industrious and prosperous.

Then come the Chinese Mestizos, or mixed breed, 400,000; double the number of the pure and genuine article. They are Buddhists and Catholics. They are in all important communities. There are merchants, tradesmen, dock hands, and laborers.

Then come other nationalities. Under the colonization of Spain, in three hundred years all the other nationalities of these islands, containing some eight or ten million people, amount to only 5,000.

The statement referred to is as follows:

[From the Democratic Magazine for January, 1899.]

Inhabitants of the Philippines; the many and mixed races occupying our new possessions in the East.

We are asked to annex to the United States a witch's caldron—

Black spirits and white, red spirits and gray,
Mingle, mingle, mingle, you that mingle may.

We are not only asked to annex the caldron and make it a part of our great, broad, Christian, Anglo-Saxon, American land, but we are asked also to annex the contents and take this brew—mixed races, Chinese, Japanese, Malay Negritos—anybody who has come along in three hundred years, in all of their concatenations and colors; and the travelers who have been there tell us and have written in the books that they are not only of all hues and colors, but there are spotted people there, and, what I have never heard of in any other country, there are striped people there with zebra signs upon them.

This mess of Asiatic pottage, 7,000 miles from the United States, in a land that we can not colonize and can not inhabit, we are told to-day by the fortune of a righteous war waged for liberty, for the ascendency of the Declaration of Independence, for the gift of freedom to an adjoining State, we must take up and annex and combine with our own blood and with our own people, and consecrate them with the oil of American citizenship.

Mr. President, there has never been since time began such a fatuous notion in the breast of a nation. There has never been such condescension from a high ideal and from a noble and manifest destiny. Not only is it a degradation of this American land and of this American race, but the scholars and thinkers of this country, the mighty men who ponder institutions and courses of events, look upon our adoption of these people and our forcible annexation of them as giving the lie to the whole current of American history and repudiating all the great principles of constitutional freedom which we proclaimed at our beginning and which have tended to make us great.

Mr. President, I have no criticism to pronounce upon my colleagues who differ with me. I have no reproaches for those who see their duty differently. I believe the gentlemen who represented our country in Paris acted honestly and conscientiously. I believe the honorable gentlemen on the other side of the Chamber mean only their country's good; but I am amazed, I am startled, I am thrown away from my ordinary bearings and conception of things to think that such gentlemen and such a body should contemplate the adoption of a treaty that utterly scorns and repudiates our position; that is essentially at war with our institutions; that embodies a country which is no part of the American continent and can not be made so, and that must inevitably take up and work into the destiny of the American people these alien races, or must make us get down from the throne of freedom which we have occupied for one hundred and twenty-five years and condescend with the scrambling nations of the world to get what we can, where we can, and how we can, to the repudiation of our national character and of our settled doctrines and principles.

Mr. President, I wish to read a few words from Professor Sumner. That he is learned and able no man will deny. That he is profound and thoughtful all men know. This is the light in which he regards the treaty:

The question of imperialism, then, is the question whether we are going to give the lie to the origin of our own national existence by establishing a colonial system of the old Spanish type, even if we have to sacrifice our existing civil and political system to do it. I submit that it is a strange incongruity to utter grand platitudes about the blessings of liberty, etc., which we are going to impart to these people and to begin by refusing to extend the Constitution over them, and still more by throwing the Constitution into the gutter here at home. If you take away the Constitution, what is the American liberty and all the rest? Nothing but a lot of phrases.

And this indeed, Mr. President, we have been plainly told here, when the great doctrines of our freedom were quoted, was a lot of phrases, and gentlemen are going to hew out a new path and make new principles upon the mimicry and policy of Great Britain and find their path where they may according to the chance medley of things. There is yet another sentence or two from Professor Sumner which I wish to read:

The cold and unnecessary cruelty of the Spaniards to the aborigines is appalling, even when compared with the treatment of the aborigines by other Europeans. A modern economist stands aghast at the economic measures adopted by Spain, as well in regard to her domestic policy as to her colonies. It seems as if those measures could only have been inspired by some demon of folly, they were so destructive to her prosperity. She possesses a large literature from the last three centuries, in which her publicists discuss with amazement the question whether it was a blessing or a curse to get the Indies, and why, with all the supposed conditions of prosperity in her hands, she was declining all the time.

We now hear it argued that she is well rid of her colonies, and that, if she will devote her energies to her internal development, and rid her politics of the corruption of colonial officials and interests, she may be regenerated. That is a rational opinion. It is the best diagnosis of her condition, and the best prescription of a remedy which the occasion has called forth. But what, then, will happen to the State which has taken over her colonies? I can see no answer except that that nation, with them, has taken over the disease, and that it now is to be corrupted by exploiting dependent communities just as she has been. That it stands exposed to this danger is undeniable.

Mr. President, it was the wisest of men who said, "The thing that hath been, it is that which shall be * * * and there is no new thing under the sun." But, sir, not until the hour that this treaty was debated in this Chamber did the idea come to my mind that it was the destiny of this great American Republic to put on the old clothes and to take those shining feet which have walked across the heights of freedom and put on them the worn-out shoes of Spain. We have dispossessed her here by our shores of the land which she despised and destroyed, and which she did not lift up, but which pulled her down to its low level. We can not make American citizens of the Filipinos with such conceptions of citizenship as we possess.

Not in a hundred years, nay, not in a thousand years, can we lift the Philippine Islands and the mixed races that there inhabit to the level of civilization which this land, God-blessed, possesses. It is easier to let down and to go down than to rise up. We have risen up through the bloody sweat and turmoil of a thousand years of battle and through bitter experiences which have chastened us. Facilis descensus Averno. The moment that this treaty is ratified, in some future age, if such shall be the case, the historian will say at that moment commenced the decline of American institutions and of the great career which America had set forth to herself to lead upon this earth.

Any way you go, this Republic will stand; this people will live for hundreds and a thousand of years to come; but I wish that the longevity of this nation might transcend to anything that ever had happened before in all the story of time. I would wish that the Declaration of Independence, instead of being belittled, might be carried nearer and closer home to every hearth and hearthstone in all this land; that it might go to the lowly and humble of whatever skin or complexion with the outstretched hand of friendship and with a message of God's love.

I would wish that all might be exalted. But whatever happens, let us not go down. We stand to-day by the bank of a broader and a deeper Rubicon than ever Cæsar meditated beside. At our feet we hear the swash of the great Pacific Ocean, and beyond lies the expansionists' dream—Cæsar's Rome. Cæsar never did wrong without just cause. That is the imperialistic plea. America will not do wrong without a great temptation. That to-day is the emancipationists' plea. For my country I hope that she will ne'er do wrong.

Let no glittering temptation of trade, let no gold from the gorgeous East tempt her eye or her hand. She stands to-day the foremost nation of the world. She stands to-day the foremost nation that ever the world has seen. Let her tread with secure and steady steps along her own highways, respecting nations and respecting men, putting into the dream of every child that goes to school that vision of liberty of which the Declaration is the great figure and of which the Constitution is the rock-bound foundation. Let her to the tempter of expansion to-day say, as He said who stood upon the mount when the glories of the earth were stretched before Him, "Get thee behind me, Satan."

Mr. President, peace! Peace! This treaty is not a treaty of peace except in formal ceremony with Spain. It is a declaration of war against the Philippine people, not by Congress, but in necessary and logical effect. We know that the Filipinos are in arms. We know that they have an army of from 12,000 to 30,000. We know that they are seeking to work out their own destiny. The moment that this treaty is adopted the Filipinos are made citizens, and the moment they are made citizens, if they do not instantly lay down their arms they become rebels. The tie of allegiance is created with this Government, and when the President or Commander in Chief says, "Our sovereignty is here; lay down your arms," they bear them no longer, under the penalty of death.

Mr. President, my country—may she ever be right; but my country, right or wrong. That is my doctrine. If the treaty is passed, I believe it is constitutional and authoritative. I do not deny the legal or constitutional right. I accept the fate and the decree of my country, and I stand with my people and my kind. At the same time I know what it means. I would that this cup might pass from us. There is a line of battle in the Philippine Islands of a dusky race, who have reared a flag and who have asked that they might be free. The moment this treaty passes, if they do not lay down their arms, it is the duty of the American President to order it, and it is the duty of the American soldier to shoot them to death and to make them lay down their arms under the penalty of execution in battle.

I hope that may not happen. I pray it may not happen. But, oh, if it should happen, what a conclusion is that of a holy and a righteous war begun for humanity and for liberty, and what justification has this nation before God and man?

The peace of the world! Mr. President, is it going to conduce to the permanent peace of the world to have the forefinger of America dipped into Asiatic politics? I much question it. Lord Salisbury, in that recent memorable speech, which all Senators have noted, declared that it was his opinion that it would help England, but as to the peace of the world, he could not see that it was any assurance of that.

We know, Mr. President, that China is in many respects a dying nation. We know that Japan, Russia, France, Germany, and Great Britain, every great nation of the world, is watching China and is trying to get certain advantages there.

Mr. President, if we take the Philippine Islands we put ourselves right there by the gate of war. We announce by taking it that we intend to take the line up there—to follow the flag. The line is far distant. It can not march there; it has got to sail there. It has got to sail 7,000 miles there over tropical seas, around the world in one direction or another. But if it must go, it will go and it will stay. But will that conduce to the world's peace?

The next thing in order to maintain ourselves we must have an ally. We will feel lonesome out there, perhaps, by ourselves. An alliance with some great nation is the next inevitable consequence of this treaty. That nation may be Great Britain.

I rejoice, Mr. President, that there have been two great moral effects of our war with Spain. In the first place, more than over any other result do I rejoice that it has made all Americans brethren in verity. If there were wrongs committed, if there were mistakes made, if there were errors for whom our fathers or ourselves were accountable thirty or forty years ago, thank God it has been wiped out in the blood of our sons. Northern and Southern men, Eastern and Western men, have baptized this nation anew with their blood under the flag.

Next to that, I rejoice that the whole English-speaking race has been brought in closer affinity. I am glad that our motherland and the people of the United States have been brought together in the manner that they ought to be brought together, by their natural relations, by the affinity of blood, and that congenial and friendly feelings exist. But no bond of alliance has been made between them. We have tied ourselves up in no legal or constitutional engagement. Friendship has grown, as it must ever grow, without sealing wax and without parchment.

But, Mr. President, if we maintain our position in the East, an alliance is necessary. It will soon come. The first rumor of war that startles our business men and that wakes America to anxiety will throw us into the arms of an alliance of some sort or another with somebody. What does that alliance with one person mean? It means the rest of the world against us. There will be alliances against the alliance. The moment that an alliance is made, then instead of having one chance for war we have two.

If we expect our ally to fight for us, we stand ready at a moment's warning to fight for it. It takes two to make a bargain. Each must be faithful to it. Then perhaps we will put a third in the alliance. Then three must stand together or fall together, and around that maelstrom just beginning to eddy on the Asiatic shore; having first pulled American sovereignty out of its natural socket between the Atlantic and the Pacific oceans, floating in the eddying waters of the tropical seas, it will bring an alliance there and an alliance against it; and around that standpoint some day will be fought a great battle for some nation in which America and her institutions will be imperiled.

It is the unexpected that happens in such adventures, as it is the unexpected that happens in war. In this way or in some other way such is the tendency of things; some collision of some sort at some time is inevitable.

Now, Mr. President, what are our alternatives? The Senator from Massachusetts [Mr. LODGE] said a few days ago that we have the alternative of ratifying the treaty or rejecting it. He portrayed great difficulties from its rejection. If it is ratified, he said, we will look out for our policies afterwards.

The Senator from Ohio [Mr. FORAKER] on the 11th of January gave considerable consideration to our alternative, and I will read what he said, because I wish to quote more accurately:

I know whereof I speak—

He said—

when I say that of the four things we had the choice of doing—giving the islands back to Spain, giving them to other countries, leaving them to anarchy, or taking them ourselves—the President acted most wisely when he concluded that we should take them ourselves.

The honorable Senator's analysis of the situation and statement of the alternatives presented to us was complete with a single striking and important exception. He omitted a fifth alternative, or rather a differentiation of the fourth. We might take them to ourselves as a sovereign accepting the perpetual sovereignty of them, and thus incorporating them eo instanti as a part of us—as we did with Porto Rico, or we might simply have required Spain to relinquish her sovereignty, and have continued our military occupation, which is a mere temporary assertion of the strong hand, and left the question of sovereignty and final disposition for future determination.

It is this fifth alternation, an easy and safe and ready and expedient course, which I do most cordially commend. The speech of the Senator from Ohio furnishes itself the reasons why this alternative, as it seems to me, is the wisest one to be pursued. He says:

I do not know of anybody who wants to take possession of the Philippine Islands and govern the people of those islands indefinitely by force of arms.

Secondly:

I say I do not know of anybody from the President of the United States down to his humblest follower in this matter who is proposing by force and violence to take and hold these islands for all time to come.

Then, Mr. President, if we are not ready by force and violence to take them if they resist, if we are not ready to follow our sovereignty by the necessary and inevitable corollary of sovereignty, why do that thing which commits us to it? Why accept or assert "sovereignty" there which in its nature contemplates all time to come, and which predicates of itself indefinite, aye, infinite extension?

Why, he says, "there are complications." He justly refrained from motives of prudence and delicacy, which I respect and follow, from stating them. But I will add, however, that my motives have the additional one of ignorance.

But whatever those complications may be, there is none imaginable that could not be dealt with from the standpoint of military occupation, which is transient, momentary, and ambulatory sovereignty without committal as to its prolongation, as by an acceptance of title and sovereignty which is the lordship of the land and of its population forever.

It is for that proposition, Mr. President, that I stand. We have the formula of it in the treaty itself. That it is acceptable to Spain when we ask it is shown by the fact that where we asked it she adopted it. There is no difficulty in the meantime.

The honorable Senator from Wisconsin [Mr. SPOONER], who addressed us so ably and candidly on yesterday, said there was no difficulty about our protocol and about our having captured Manila. I have read that protocol. It solves instead of suggesting difficulty, for it by its own terms provides that until by treaty we have settled this matter we are to remain in possession of the stronghold of the situation. So we will stay there as an intruder. We stay there by consent of Spain, and she herself has provided in that protocol the very situation which we would most desire and most comfortably occupy for a waiting period.

So, then, I say, Mr. President, from the standpoint of that protocol, by Spanish consent occupying the bay and harbor of Manila, exercising our good offices as far as we may to get her prisoners released from the insurgent Filipinos, going on and fulfilling all the details of the protocol with Spain in sending her soldiers back to their native land, there awaits her but one thing, to leave America free from Filipino annexation, in occupation of the theater of the war and in such a condition that honorably, reasonably, she may do henceforth without embarrassment that which seemeth unto her good as a free people.

Mr. President, there are two great leaders of political parties in the United States whose names will never be forgotten, and who, however great may be those who will take their places hereafter, will never be transcended in the hold that they have upon the affections of the common people of this country. It is fortunate for the country and fortunate for both parties that it is so.

One of those men was Thomas Jefferson, the author of the Declaration of Independence, the great annexationist of American territory, the man who from the beginning repudiated all annexations of territory ultra mare. The other one of those great leaders was Abraham Lincoln; and, singularly enough and fortunately enough in the contemplation of the great subject which we have before us to-day, Thomas Jefferson and Abraham Lincoln stand for the same doctrine, and the two parties are made into one stream flowing into the great constitutional channel of American liberty.

Mr. President, both of these men, more than any men of their day and generation, had confidence in and trusted the common people. Each of them believed that every individual had rights which all men were bound to respect; and if Thomas Jefferson was the author of the Declaration, Abraham Lincoln carried that Declaration severely, exactly, and strictly to its logical and essential consequences. We have just got through that work with the loss of much blood and treasure, and to each gentleman who to-day may hesitate upon this subject, be he a Democrat, I would say: "My friend, follow the teaching and the inspiration of Jefferson;" and, if he be a Republican, "I invoke the spirit and teaching of Abraham Lincoln."

Mr. President, there be those who see an American scepter in the eastern sky. It may be that that scepter is there; but if that scepter be there, it is not a scepter that sparkles by the side of the star that shone over the manger of Bethlehem when the shepherds watched their flocks at night and when the wise men, looking for the Messiah, came.

No, Mr. President; I would rather invoke to-day that star which hovered over old Independence Hall on the morning of that 4th of July, 1776, when the world waited the deliverance of a mighty message; I would point to that star, the star of the great northern Republic, founded by the great white race of the northern nations; I would say we go on no war of conquest; I would say that we respect the weakest and the most helpless of mankind; I would say to the men who are fighting for their freedom, be they many or be they few, be they in Cuba or be they in the Philippine Islands, that to them the great American Republic gives the salute of honor and dares not condescend to put her foot upon their necks.

I would point again, Mr. President, to that bright star that beamed over Independence Hall in the bright morning of our birthright, and I would hope that ever hereafter we might say of it that of its—

* * * true-fix'd and resting quality
There is no fellow in the firmament.

[Applause in the galleries.]

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

FRIDAY, February 3, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

CORRECTION.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a correction of the RECORD, involving also a question of personal privilege.

The SPEAKER. The House will be in order, and gentlemen will take their seats. [A pause.] The gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON] will proceed.

Mr. BURTON. Mr. Speaker, I find on pages 1524 and 1525 of to-day's RECORD certain remarks published as having been delivered by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY].

Mr. GROSVENOR. I hope my colleague [Mr. BURTON] will recognize the fact that the gentleman from Texas is not now present.

Mr. BURTON. I am coming to that.

Mr. Speaker, I have no recollection whatever of these remarks having been made on the floor of the House; and they contain insinuations and inferences which make it my duty as a matter of personal privilege to answer them. I am informed that the gentleman from Texas, who is, of course, interested in this matter, is not present on the floor of the House; but I make the motion that the so-called speech of the gentleman from Texas as printed on the pages I have named be stricken out and that there be substituted what was actually said by the gentleman at the time.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman intend to leave that motion pending until the gentleman from Texas is in the House?

Mr. BURTON. I understand that the gentleman from Texas is now present; and if permitted by the Chair, I will conclude what I have to say.

I wish to say, in the first place, that I have no recollection of any such remarks as those printed on these pages having been made in the House. In two places in the RECORD of yesterday the minute is made, "Mr. HAWLEY withholds his remarks for revision." Had the statements set forth here been made on the floor of the House I should certainly have answered them. Briefly speaking, they contain insinuations against the Committee on Rivers and Harbors and against me of too much interest in regard to an appropriation included in the bill of $250,000 for a channel from the Galveston jetties to Texas City, and a claim that the provision had no parliamentary status before the House. It is due to the committee and to myself that this matter be fully explained.

Statements were made before us that the appropriation of $8,000,000 for the harbor at Galveston, the largest appropriation made for any harbor in the United States, and the works constructed with that appropriation, were ineffective to accomplish what was intended, because of limited wharf and dock facilities at Galveston. The statement was made that at one time 1,800 cars were waiting there to be unloaded, part of them loaded with perishable freight. The claim was made more strenuously, I may say, than anything before the committee that in order to relieve this congestion it was necessary to construct a canal and to canalize a bayou 58½ miles to Houston, at an expense of $4,000,000. Certain members of the committee, when on a visit to that place in 1897, noticed this location at Texas City.

Certain persons interested appeared before the committee—two of them, I believe, from Minnesota and one from Texas, supported by a lawyer from Ohio—making an argument for this improvement. We suggested to them the difficulty of making appropriation for it, in view of the fact that we had no estimate before us. But it seemed to us of the utmost importance, in view of the fact that $8,000,000 had been appropriated there and that the benefit of it largely accrued to the Galveston Wharf and Dock Company, a corporation which charged enormous rates for wharfage and which could not furnish sufficient facilities for the growing traffic of that port, that something be done. It seemed to us that this expenditure for Texas City was the best way out of this troublesome question.

As I am informed, on the request of these gentlemen, one from Texas and one or two from Minnesota, the member from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY] introduced a resolution asking for a survey and estimate, giving the cost of this supposed improvement. So far as I know, from the day he introduced that resolution to this he never said to any member of the committee—certainly not to me—anything that looked like an objection to that improvement. I take it to be the inference, whenever a man introduces a resolution of this kind, that he is friendly to it and that he is committed to it. I have never known, as a member of the River and Harbor Committee, a case where a man, after introducing a resolution calling for a survey or estimate, has had the courage, I may say, to come afterwards before the committee or the House and say that he did not favor the improvement.

The committee supposed that this was not only a project which would relieve the situation, but one that had the cordial support of the member from that district. And I must suggest to him that it would have been more fair toward the committee, more honest and, I may say, more manly, if he had come before the committee and told them the objections to that project, rather than to print in some remarks published in the RECORD that there were divers objections to it.

Mr. HAWLEY. I hope the gentleman will allow me a moment.

Mr. BURTON. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. What opportunity had I to come before your committee and to know that this appropriation was to be made at this time?

Mr. BURTON. There were seventeen members of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors; and any one of that membership the member from Texas could have seen, and he would have been listened to by him.

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly, if I had known that it was in contemplation by the committee to make an appropriation of this character.

Mr. BURTON. The member from Texas must have known of the fact.

Mr. HAWLEY. But he denies the fact that he knew that the committee contemplated making any such appropriation as that.

Mr. BURTON. He must have known the fact from the member from his own State, at all events, who was on the committee. The matter was not done in private.

I understand the gentleman makes complaint also that he did not receive due and full consideration from the chairman of the committee. In regard to that, Mr. Speaker, just let me say a single word. As a matter of fact, the chairman of the committee gave to the member from Texas more time and consideration than to any other member of the House who was not a member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. I listened to all that he had to say, heard him in reference to any suggestions he had to make, read all of his pamphlets and papers, examined all of the maps and charts that he produced, and gave him a patient hearing in all respects.

On one occasion, on a day when many Members of the House and several Senators from the other end of the Capitol were waiting to interview me with reference to matters to be embodied in the bill, I understood the member from Texas to make this remark, substantially, "I am scarcely admitted even to the room of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, and am not permitted to speak to the chairman of that committee."

Now, Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that at any time, and on every day, when that bill was under consideration up to midnight, the member could have had access to the committee room or to the chairman of the committee, and when there was no possible restriction placed on any hearing which he even suggested he desired to have before the committee, it did seem, as a matter of justice to the chairman of the committee and to the members of the committee, that this remark was entirely uncalled for, and I called him down for it. And I may be permitted to say here that there is no one—whether a member of this House or elsewhere—who is prominent enough, in case he made such a remark as that, to escape being called down for it immediately.

It is not a very pleasant thing to "stand off" the different members of the House who are seeking appropriations in their various sections to an amount aggregating $250,000,000 or $260,000,000. But there is no member who can say that he was not treated with due courtesy and consideration by the committee.

I had some controversies, of course, with various members of the House in respect to appropriations for various localities in which they were interested, but if there is any member of this House, aside from the member from Texas, who can say that either I or any member of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors did not treat him with due courtesy and consideration, let him stand up on this floor and so declare.

In endeavoring to secure economy in this bill and the best results, the committee have tried to do their duty to the country and to the House.

Now, it has been said that there was no parliamentary status for this bill. A difference of opinion existed with reference to that in the committee, but it was first raised and passed upon in another case, that of Sabine Pass, where there was nothing whatever but an estimate of cost of $50,000, and no recommendation. On full discussion, on a vote of the committee—and I may say my own vote was not in favor of it—that item was included. The committee then adhered to the rule that if we had an official estimate we could incorporate items of this kind, and in three cases without a formal survey did include such items, and I think they are among the most important in the bill.

We had an estimate from the engineer's office to the effect that $500,000 would do this work. Private parties came forward and said they would do it for $250,000; and to make the work already done at Galveston useful and effective, and to save that $8,000,000, more than half of which may be said to have been for the benefit of a single monopoly in Galveston, we thought the best course to pursue was to insert this $250,000.

If I have offended the gentleman's sense of dignity, if I have wounded his vanity (sometimes these two things being more important with men than the orderly and decent transaction of business), I am sorry; but I thought I did my duty to this House and to the country, and I want to say to him that if anyone had come in with the same offensive remark about me or the committee, he would have been met with my protest and with a remark which would have been equally curt.

Mr. HAWLEY. I wish you would state explicitly again to the House what that offensive remark was.

Mr. BURTON. The offensive remark was this: "I am hardly allowed in the committee room, and not permitted to speak to the chairman."

Mr. HAWLEY. To whom did I say that?

Mr. BURTON. To me.

Mr. HAWLEY. To you?

Mr. BURTON. Yes.

Mr. HAWLEY. Let me ask if you will bear with me for a moment to recite just what did occur on that occasion?

Mr. BURTON. I certainly understood you to make that remark, and to that I responded in these words: "My dear sir, do you expect me to see one hundred men in the course of a day and give each a half an hour?"

On the preceding day you had requested for a half hour's interview, and that after I had given to the member from Texas more time than to any other member of the House not a member of this committee.

I want to say that the record of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors is clear in this matter. We consulted the engineers; we found it to be a fact that 14 feet existed there without injuring the jetties or other public work, and it was a place to which the leading cotton factors of the great Southwest have already moved a part of their plant. It was a place at which there was unlimited room for docks and wharves. It was a place near to the end of those jetties, and I repeat again, that if the member from Texas had any objection or knew anything he should have come before this committee and contradicted his solemn act in introducing this resolution, or let the committee know what he wanted about it and what he meant about it. It was his duty to let us know if there was any objection to this measure, and not to come in here, and even then not on the floor of the House, but later in the RECORD, to insert an accusation and insinuation that we were particularly interested in some particular locality.

I even now, gentlemen of the House, say that I question whether a mistake was not made in striking out that item; but as this degree of criticism has been raised about it, I want to say that this river and harbor bill, so far as the committee is concerned, is going to be like Cæsar's wife—above suspicion. If there is any man who makes any criticism on this provision from that locality, I do not care even if the suspicion arises that he does it in the interest of another port, even if it is in the interest of a wharf and dock company which is imposing upon the people of the whole Southwest, this committee are going to, and we did ourselves propose to, throw it out, saying, as I did the other day, that the gentleman from Texas must settle that with his own constituents.

But when he goes further and accuses the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of a special interest and makes an attack backed, I understand, by vicious newspaper attacks, I say he is making an insinuation against the committee whose sole labor was to do its duty in bringing in a river and harbor bill which would meet the approval of this House and which would meet the approval of the whole country. [Applause.]

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The Chair understands that the gentleman from Ohio moves that the remarks be stricken out, and that there be substituted what was actually said, as shown by the reporters' notes. That is the question before the House.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to say at the outset that I accept the gentleman's declaration of good faith. I shall discuss this question as I saw it then and as I see it now. There was before the River and Harbor Committee a bill proposed by me for an improvement of the harbor at the mouth of the Brazos. The committee heard me on that question and considered it, and not until the hearings were closed, as I understood it, was I informed by the chairman that this particular bill, or this proposal, was without parliamentary status. The engineers had been there, appointed as a special commission, to examine that stream. They had made a report in conformity with the resolution which sent them there. They had stated that it was an enterprise that could be developed in the interest of commerce.

The one thing which they omitted to say, that they did not say, was what the estimated cost would be to complete it; but in all other points they covered the proposition, which gave it, as I supposed, a parliamentary status. Finally, when this bill was approaching its completion, a member of the River and Harbor Committee came to me and asked for the introduction of a bill or resolution which asked that a survey be made in Galveston Bay between Galveston Harbor and Texas City. As a matter of courtesy to him I introduced this resolution. I did not know for several days thereafter that this resolution had not passed the House. I understood afterwards that it had been objected to and a survey had never been authorized by Congress.

Now, I would like to inquire whether that affected a proposition or not; whether it was a question that Congress should have authorized this survey before, or whether the River and Harbor Committee on the one hand should proceed to determine the parliamentary status of a commission which had been assigned to a given point, and which made a full and complete report in all respects—before they could have any other authorization, in a subsequent measure, they could proceed to legislate on the simple statement of interested parties. It was hardly to be supposed that they would make this appropriation of $250,000 without the fullest information in respect to the surroundings at Texas City and Galveston Harbor.

What I objected to, and most seriously, was that the committee could not have been fully acquainted with all the circumstances and conditions that existed in and about Galveston Bay which would be affected by the construction of this channel. I was certainly not opposed to any improvement in the bay. I was not opposed to this project itself. But I could foresee, as every man acquainted with the waters of Galveston Bay could, that there was great danger in digging a channel without providing in the most explicit way for the manner in which it should be dug, for the diposition of the material to come from it, and for the manner in which it should be maintained thereafter.

It may be, also, that I felt incensed that the committee should declare that there was no parliamentary status to a measure that had proceeded as far as the Brazos survey had, and that there was parliamentary status in another which had not proceeded through Congress at all. These were the considerations that moved me to inquire why—and in the nature of the things why—the River and Harbor Committee had refused distinctly to report a case wherein there was parliamentary status on the one side and made an appropriation of $350,000 for another project that had never had the authorization of Congress to even have a survey made of that project.

I knew, and I said to this House, that an able, eloquent, and persuasive gentleman from the home of the chairman of the River and Harbor Committee had stated this case before the River and Harbor Committee, and I complained of it because his pleading was heard, and because the persuasions of interested parties influenced the committee to come to a conclusion when the presentation of the Representative from that district had not been heard at all in respect to the matter. But greater than that, and above that, and as I believe I said here, as to the parliamentary status of legislation, the engineers were not heard from in an official way. I do not know what information was secured except that, as I am generally informed, the War Department asked the local engineer at Galveston what it would cost to dig this channel. His reply was that it could be dug for $500,000.

Mr. BURTON. Will the gentleman allow me to ask him a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. Certainly.

Mr. BURTON. I see the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS], a member of the committee, is not present. I will ask you to state whether it is true you had several conversations with the gentleman from Minnesota—it is not a matter within my own knowledge—that you called upon with a gentleman from Texas, and both of you expressed your unqualified good will to this project.

Mr. HAWLEY. You have asked if he called with the gentleman from Texas. He did not; he called with friends of his from Duluth, Minn.; and in the presence of these gentlemen I suggested the character of the resolution that would be introduced here.

Mr. BURTON. The gentleman does not deny that he introduced the resolution here in that form?

Mr. HAWLEY. It is not necessary for the gentleman to put his question in that way; no one expects me to deny it here, and I do not think the gentleman does. If he does, I am mistaken in him. This resolution was introduced in explicit terms at the request of the gentleman from Minnesota, a member of the River and Harbor Committee, that a survey might be made.

The resolution never passed the House, and I do not know now how it came about that without that authorization the River and Harbor Committee were informed of the sum that would be required to dig this channel, upon which they could base an estimate and make an appropriation. They were not told by the engineer, either, that it was a commendable and advisable thing to do. The gentleman did not evidently inform himself as to what the consequences might be, and, in my judgment, under this bill, would be, in its effect on that splendid harbor, which was created under the beneficent action of this Government and which accommodates to-day more than one hundred millions of commerce and a large and rapidly increasing tonnage every season.

I wonder what the gentleman's reflections would have been if, under this authorization, this channel had been dug and it had been found under its influence that Galveston Channel was continually being shoaled by the earth which was thrown up from this channel to the amount of three or four millions of cubic yards. This is simply to the merits of the question, and it is to show that the committee was not informed, and the chairman himself could not have been informed with respect to this matter or this bill never would have been passed through the committee, as it did not pass through the House.

Now, with respect to my remarks, I do not know, except in one instance, of a single thought that is in this RECORD that I did not speak here on the floor. It is true that a part of the language that is here was not employed by me in terms, perhaps, and I omitted to request that my remarks might be extended in the RECORD, having never had occasion to do so before. There is one part to which I call attention in arguing this matter, that I omitted to say on the floor, and that was with respect to the contractor who was directed, or whom the Secretary of War was authorized to employ, to dig this channel. I do not know of any other part of my remarks that did not find expression here in some form in my request that this part of the measure be stricken from the bill.

Now, with respect to the gentleman's motion, I would like to know if it is not the custom, and if the gentleman, on the occasion of this discussion, himself did not make such revision of his remarks as he thought proper?

Mr. BURTON. Does the gentleman intend that as a question?

Mr. HAWLEY. The gentleman can answer it as such if he pleases.

Mr. BURTON. Decidedly no, so that it shows an attack on a member not made in debate.

Mr. HAWLEY. I say, Mr. Speaker, there is no portion of this speech embraced in the RECORD that was not in form expressed on this floor except that part which relates to the contractor. Now, in regard to the gentleman's motion, it is not necessary, Mr. Speaker, that it be put. I shall myself ask, if the gentleman, or the committee, or any one of them, find such grave offense in what I have stated—I shall ask to remove it from the RECORD in such a way as I can, and, with such revision only as is the daily custom in this House, incorporate in the RECORD the remarks that were delivered on the floor day before yesterday.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, in view of the character of the attack which is found printed in the RECORD, I think it is due to the committee, of which I have long been a member, that I should say something. It has always been a rule of that committee that no project of any sort, great or small, should be incorporated in a bill unless we had before us the estimate of the Engineer Department in some form, giving us something upon which we could base an opinion as to what would be the ultimate cost of the proposed work. Usually that information has come to us in pursuance of a resolution previously passed by Congress directing that a survey should be made under the supervision of the Secretary of War for the purpose of ascertaining those facts.

Mr. STEELE. I rise to a point of order. The gentleman from Ohio has made his statement, and the gentleman from Texas has signified his desire to have whatever was offensive removed from the RECORD. I submit that there is no question of privilege now before the House.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I am not addressing myself to a question of privilege.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the question before the House is the motion of the gentleman from Ohio to strike out the published speech of the gentleman from Texas and to substitute the speech as written from the reporters' notes.

Mr. STEELE. I understood it was a question of privilege, but if I do not understand the question——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Ohio did rise to a question of privilege, but the matter seems to have terminated in a proposition to correct the RECORD.

Mr. CATCHINGS. I supposed that I was speaking with the consent of the House.

The SPEAKER. The Chair has permitted the discussion to proceed on that basis. But a point of order being made, he must rule that remarks should be confined to the proposition before the House.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Well, Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that I be allowed a few minutes to make some statements with reference to the methods of the River and Harbor Committee.

The SPEAKER. For what length of time?

Mr. CATCHINGS. I shall occupy a very few minutes. I am not in the habit of occupying the time of the House very long.

Mr. DOCKERY. I ask that the gentleman from Mississippi be allowed fifteen minutes.

There was no objection.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Mr. Speaker, as I was stating, it oftentimes has happened that when we have directed a survey to be made it has been reported to Congress by the Chief of Engineers that a survey was unnecessary, because he had sufficient information upon which to make the estimate without incurring the expense and trouble of a survey.

The gentleman's idea of what constitutes a parliamentary status is a little confused, no doubt because of the fact that he has not been familiar with the methods which have prevailed with reference to this kind of legislation. So far as concerns the projected improvement at the mouth of the Brazos River, we clearly could not have been justified in recommending the Government to undertake that work, because there was not a syllable in the reports of the engineers giving the slightest idea as to what would be the cost of that work.

When this Texas City project was presented it impressed me more than anything else which was called to our attention. I believed then, and I believe now, that the excavation of that channel would give immense relief to commerce and would do no harm to the harbor of Galveston or to any human being, unless it might be those persons who are concerned in the ownership of this Galveston wharfage monopoly.

But the matter did have a parliamentary status because we did get an estimate from the engineer as to what would be the cost of this work. It is true it did not come to us in response to a formal demand for a survey, but that is not essential. There is no limitation in the rule of this House which undertakes to define the jurisdiction of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors. We are vested with the sole and absolute discretion as to how we shall deal with matters of this sort, subject, of course, to the final action of this House. Such rules, other than this, as have been laid down for us are of our own making and have no existence in any rule of this House or statute law. But we have felt always that we would not be justified in suggesting any proposition unless we were able to say to this House that we had first obtained an estimate from the engineers as to what the cost of the work would be.

Gentlemen will see the distinction I am making. So far as the work at Brazos River was concerned we had no estimate or statement of any sort from any engineer, either the Chief of Engineers or any subordinate, as to what that work would cost; but as to the work at Texas City we did have an estimate, and an offer was made to the committee to do this work for just one-half the amount estimated as the cost by the engineers; and believing this to be a valuable work, we accepted the proposition. So far as I am concerned, I greatly regret the action of the House in striking out the provision which was inserted in the bill, and I sincerely trust that the Senators from the State of Texas, when this bill reaches the other side of this Capitol, will see that such a provision is inserted, in the interest of all those persons who are compelled to transact their business through the great harbor of Galveston.

In confirmation of what the chairman of our committee has said, I want to say that there never was an intimation, so far as I know, from my friend from Texas or from anybody else, that this was not both a worthy and a desirable work. I voted for it believing that it would be acceptable to the distinguished gentleman from the Galveston district. If I had had occasion to have any suspicions upon that point, I certainly would have inquired of him personally as to what his opinion was on the subject.

The suggestion that the spoil excavated from this channel might operate as an obstruction to the harbor is utterly without merit, as my friend will see when he comes to inquire into the methods by which the excavation of rivers and harbors is carried on by the Engineer Department. Those officers are always particular to see that the spoil arising from any excavation is so placed that it can not return to the channel or harbor as an obstruction. If there is one thing more than another which these officers have pressed upon our attention it has been the necessity of an establishment of harbor lines for the special purpose of seeing that no dump or waste of any sort is allowed to accumulate to the obstruction of the harbors.

Mr. HAWLEY. Will the gentleman permit me?

Mr. CATCHINGS. Certainly.

Mr. HAWLEY. You are doubtless aware of the fact that there is not a word in this measure, as proposed, that directs the contractor whom the Secretary of War is authorized to employ to make provision as to the disposition of this material or provide for the preservation and protection of the harbor.

Mr. CATCHINGS. Why, there is no necessity for the incorporation of such a provision as that, as the gentleman of course must understand. This bill gives to the Secretary of War authority to make the contract. But the Secretary of War is charged with the supervision and care of all of the rivers and harbors of the country, and it is a part of his duty to see that no harm is done to them by any work of river and harbor improvement. The contract must be made under the supervision and with the consent of the Secretary of War, and he is charged by the law with the preservation of all of the harbors of the country. And the gentleman can depend upon the fact that if the proposed contract had been made, adequate provision would have been inserted in it for the protection of the harbor.

It is not necessary nor is it proper for the House to repeat to him his duty in that regard on all occasions. It is a well-settled purpose on his part, and has been recognized by him and repeated by him over and over again in the reports on works of various kinds throughout the country which he has submitted to Congress, to protect improvements as far as possible from deterioration.

My friend must understand also that this contract was not required to be made at all. The provision was inserted upon the condition that it was to be done under the supervision of the Secretary of War.

Mr. HAWLEY. I beg pardon of the gentleman for interrupting him, but I do not understand the bill to make any such provision as that.

Mr. CATCHINGS. The gentleman is in error; it does so state specifically. The general provisions of the bill cover just such a point, and it is the duty of the Secretary of War to scrutinize carefully, by his subordinates, all conditions which arise in the execution of any authorized contracts. There is no danger on that point. The preservation of the harbor, as far as possible, is a duty which is impliedly imposed upon the Secretary.

I do not believe, Mr. Speaker, that it is essential that anything more need be said upon this question. I have made this brief statement simply for the reason that I am exceedingly anxious that the Committee on Rivers and Harbors shall retain the confidence of our colleagues on the floor of the House.

I know, speaking for myself and for my associates on the committee, that we have labored unceasingly not only for the purpose of meeting the requirements of all sections of the country, but with a keen spirit of inquiry, with a view to patiently investigate every suggestion which has been made to us by members from all parts of the country in reference to improvements in their various districts. And I challenge any man on the floor of the House to take up this bill and go through its provisions in conjunction with the reports of the engineers and put his finger upon a single provision of the bill or a single appropriation authorized by the bill that would not, in his judgment, be entirely a proper one in view of the reports and the data before the committee. There is not one. I will venture to assert, that would not meet the approval of any thoughtful man who investigated the matter for himself.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the motion of the gentleman from Ohio, to strike out certain portions of the RECORD.

The question was taken; and on a division (demanded by Mr. DOCKERY) there were—ayes 78, noes 0.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Speaker, I suggest that there is no quorum.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman suggests that there is no quorum present.

Mr. RICHARDSON. The gentleman does not suggest that there is no quorum present, but that there is no quorum voting. Which does he mean?

The SPEAKER. Well, the gentleman must take the orthodox way. [Laughter.] Does the gentleman from Missouri make the point that there is no quorum present?

Mr. DOCKERY. I make the point that there is no quorum present, and that there is no quorum voting.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will count and ascertain if there is a quorum present.

After counting the House, the Speaker announced that 149 members were present—not a quorum.

Several MEMBERS. Regular order!

The SPEAKER. Under the rule, a call of the House will be ordered, the yeas and nays will be taken on the pending question, the doors will be closed, and those members who are present and do not desire to be recorded, either for or against the proposition, will record themselves as present.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 111, nays 10, answered present 102, not voting 128; as follows:

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, I beg to make a parliamentary inquiry. I understand the status of this matter now to be that my remarks, as made on the floor of the House, are to be incorporated in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. The vote has not yet been decided. The gentleman will have to ask that later.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

Mr. BRUMM. I notice there are a number of persons here present who have not voted.

The SPEAKER. There has been an announcement of the vote. It is too late. They could have voted had they made the suggestion. The gentleman from Texas desires to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas [Mr. HAWLEY] desires to make a parliamentary inquiry.

Mr. HAWLEY. I desire to learn, Mr. Speaker, the present status of this matter and to say that I understand it to be that the remarks which were published in yesterday's RECORD are to be substituted for the remarks that are in the hands of the reporters.

The SPEAKER. The reverse of that.

Mr. HAWLEY. I intended to state that the remarks which are in the RECORD are to be substituted by the remarks in the hands of the reporters. I wish to say, if I may, as a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, that I understand the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. BURTON], who insisted upon this vote after my statement, has complained to this House that the language used makes an attack upon him in a manner that was not used on the floor of this House. The RECORD, which will convey and contain the language which was used, will show that in that respect the language not only has not been increased in its offensive matter or added to in any way, except, perhaps, to change or modify the form of expression somewhat, but that the offensive matter, as he designates it, that is in to-day's RECORD will be found in that of to-morrow, and, much as I regret it, a regret which I expressed on this floor to this House and to him, I wish to say now that I want it to be in the RECORD, every word of it, and I stand by it, here and anywhere that I may be asked to answer for it.

Mr. SIMPSON. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. For what purpose does the gentleman rise?

Mr. SIMPSON. I wish to move to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. BRUMM. Too late.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, a privileged report.

Mr. SIMPSON. Why, Mr. Speaker, I was on the floor and yielded to the gentleman from Texas.

The SPEAKER. Did the gentleman from Kansas vote in the affirmative?

Mr. SIMPSON. I voted in the affirmative.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Kansas moves to reconsider the vote just taken.

Mr. BRUMM. Upon that I rise to a point of order, Mr. Speaker. That motion comes too late. Other matter had intervened between the announcement of the vote and the motion to reconsider.

The SPEAKER. The rule of the House provides that it may be made on the same or the succeeding day.

Mr. SIMPSON. For the information of the gentleman from Pennsylvania——

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to reconsider.

The question was taken; and on a division there were—ayes 61, noes 42.

Mr. SIMPSON. No quorum.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks a quorum is present.

Mr. SIMPSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I move that the House do now adjourn. It is perfectly apparent that there can be no transaction of business to-day.

The question being taken on the motion of Mr. BAILEY that the House do now adjourn, on a division (demanded by Mr. GIBSON) there were—ayes 99, noes 64.

Mr. BRUMM. The yeas and nays.

The yeas and nays were ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 96, nays 110 answered "present" 5, not voting 140; as follows:

So the House refused to adjourn.

The following additional pair was announced:

Mr. SHERMAN with Mr. WILSON, for this day.

Mr. MCCLELLAN. Mr. Speaker, I ask to be recorded as "present."

Mr. BURKE. Mr. Speaker, I was in my seat, came in just as my name was reached on the second roll call, but I did not hear it. I did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman does not come within the rule.

Mr. BURKE. I was present and listening at the time, but did not hear my name called.

The SPEAKER. Was the gentleman listening at the time his name should have been called and failed to hear it?

Mr. BURKE. I was on the last roll. I was in my seat and present, and had just come into the House.

The SPEAKER. Does the gentleman think his name was not called?

Mr. BURKE. If it was I did not detect it. I have always been pretty prompt in answering the roll call.

The SPEAKER. The Chair thinks the gentleman does not bring himself within the rule.

Mr. BURKE. That is with the Chair.

The result of the vote was then announced as above recorded.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the motion to reconsider, on which the yeas and nays have been ordered.

The question was taken; and there were—yeas 66, nays 85, answered "present" 29, not voting 171; as follows:

Until further notice:

Mr. SAUERHERING with Mr. BALL.

Mr. BUTLER with Mr. SLAYDEN.

For this day:

Mr. VAN VOORHIS with Mr. MCDOWELL.

Mr. KERR with Mr. CLAYTON.

Mr. SHELDEN with Mr. MCRAE.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The gentleman will state it.

Mr. COX. I want to understand what is going on.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. The point of order is well taken.

Mr. COX. The Chair is surrounded by intelligent gentlemen who ought to be in their seats.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen will take their seats.

Mr. COX. Let them sit down, and see what we are doing. [After a pause.] There is not a man in this House as far back as I am that can tell what is going on. I ask for order, so that we may know.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Gentlemen will please take their seats.

Mr. COX. Oh, well, Mr. Speaker, if you are running the machine up there, that is all right. [Laughter.]

The SPEAKER pro tempore. On this question the yeas are 65, the nays 84, present 29. The nays have it; and the motion is not agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, does not the rule require that the names of those marked "present" shall be recorded? Is it sufficient for the Chair to announce so many present?

The SPEAKER pro tempore. Those answering "present" are recorded on the roll.

Mr. BAILEY. Answering "present;" the Chair did not state that.

The SPEAKER pro tempore. There were present and not voting, and not answering, Mr. WANGER of Pennsylvania, Mr. LANDIS of Indiana, Mr. MCALEER of Pennsylvania, and Mr. KERR of Ohio.

Mr. BRUMM. I call for the regular order.

Mr. DOCKERY. Did a quorum respond?

Mr. WANGER. I was present and voted, and withdrew my vote and asked to be recorded as "present."

The SPEAKER pro tempore. That was improperly stated by the Chair. The gentleman did answer "present." The regular order is demanded.

Mr. BROMWELL. I hope the gentleman will withdraw the call for the regular order for the present.

Mr. BRUMM. I will withdraw the demand for the regular order.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the resolution which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Concurrent resolution asking for the recall of House resolution 296.

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the United States (the Senate of the United States concurring), That the President be respectfully requested to return to the House of Representatives House joint resolution No. 296, now in his hands.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, in explanation of the concurrent resolution I will say that two or three weeks ago this House passed a joint resolution, which was sent to the Senate and also passed by that body, and was sent to the President, calling for information from the Secretary of State concerning certain outrages perpetrated on American citizens in China. The President has called my attention to the fact that the resolution calling for information was joint in form and, if signed by the President, might be used as a precedent that one House alone had not the right to call for such information; and he suggested to me that, as the ten days would be up to-morrow and it might be impossible for him to approve this bill, it might be well to pass a concurrent resolution in the two Houses asking for a recall of the papers, after which, if that is done, I shall ask permission of the House to present a resolution from the House itself, rather than a joint resolution. This is the concurrent resolution asking the President for the return to the House of the joint resolution which was improperly passed. I ask for a vote.

The SPEAKER pro tempore (Mr. GROSVENOR). Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BROMWELL, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

MESSAGE FROM THE SENATE.

A message from the Senate, by Mr. PLATT, one of its clerks, announced that the Senate had agreed to the report of the committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11487) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed the bill (S. 5386) restoring to the pension roll the name of Samuel S. McDonald.

The message also announced that the Senate had passed without amendment the following resolution:

Resolved by the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring). That there be printed and bound in cloth 6,000 additional copies of the Report of the Director of the Mint for the fiscal year ended June 30, 1898: 1,000 for the use of the Senate, 2,000 for the use of the House of Representatives, and 3,000 for the use of the Director of the Mint.

SENATE BILL REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV, Senate bill of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. 5386. An act restoring to the pension roll the name of Samuel S. McDonald—to the Committee on Invalid Pensions.

ENROLLED BILL SIGNED.

Mr. HAGER, from the Committee on Enrolled Bills, reported that they had examined and found truly enrolled bill of the following title; when the Speaker signed the same:

H. R. 6718. An act for the relief of Samuel Racey.

RUTH MARCH.

Mr. WEYMOUTH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 2374) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a duplicate bond to Benjamin H. March, guardian of Ruth March.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Secretary of the Treasury be, and he is hereby, authorized and instructed to issue a duplicate bond in the name of Benjamin H. March, guardian of Ruth March, an insane person, in lieu of a United States 4 per cent registered bond issued under the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 28, 1871, No. 68830, for $1,000, inscribed in the name of Ruth March, and alleged to have been lost or destroyed: Provided, That the said Benjamin H. March shall first file in the Treasury a bond in a penal sum equal to the amount of the said missing bond and the interest which would accrue thereon until the principal thereof becomes due and payable, with two good and sufficient sureties, residents of the United States, to be approved by the Secretary of the Treasury, with condition to indemnify and save harmless the United States from any claim because of the lost or destroyed bond.

With the following amendment recommended by the committee:

Amend by striking out the words "equal to" and inserting the words "in double;" so that it will read "a bond in a penal sum in double the amount."

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker, I would like to hear a little explanation of this.

Mr. WEYMOUTH. This is simply a bill to issue a duplicate bond to the executor of Ruth March, and it is surrounded by all the usual safeguards. Mr. Speaker, I offer the amendment which I send to the Clerk's desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend said bill (H. R. 2374) by striking out, in lines 5 and 6, the following words, "guardian of Ruth March, an insane person," and insert in lieu thereof the following: "executor of the last will and testament of Ruth March, deceased."

Also, to amend the title to said bill by striking out the words "guardian of Ruth March" and insert in lieu thereof the following: "executor of the last will and testament of Ruth March, deceased."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the bill? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

Mr. DOCKERY. I would like to have the report read.

Mr. COX. Mr. Speaker, I rise to a point of order. I am as anxious as anyone to hear what is going on; and if this confusion is to go on, we are voting in the dark.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Tennessee makes the point of order that the House is in disorder, which point is well taken. If all gentlemen would refrain from conversation, there would not be any. The Clerk will proceed.

The Clerk read the report (by Mr. GRAFF), as follows:

The Committee on Claims, having under consideration the bill (H. R. 2374) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a duplicate bond to Benjamin March, as guardian of Ruth March, an insane person, find the following facts from the sworn proofs in the case:

That Ruth March lives in Ashby, a small town in Massachusetts, and has resided there for many years; that she is 84 years of age and has become insane. She owned a United States registered bond, issued under the acts of July 14, 1870, and January 20, 1871, for the sum of $1,000, and collected the interest on the said bond from time to time down to and including the interest due July 1, 1895.

Benjamin H. March, of Ashby, Mass., her nephew, was duly appointed guardian of said Ruth March on July 17, 1895. A thorough search through all her papers and effects has been made for said bond, and it has not been found. It was shown that she shortly before burned some of her papers. It is not known whether or not said bond was then burned.

The affidavits by her neighbors and those with whom she came in contact rebut the presumption that the bond has been assigned, but tend to prove and prove, in the opinion of the committee, that said bond is lost or destroyed, although the evidence is circumstantial on that point. The woman is in such a condition mentally as not to be able to furnish any information on the subject.

The committee recommend that the bill be amended by striking out the words "equal to," in the thirteenth line of said bill, and inserting in lieu thereof the words "in double," and as thus amended the bill do pass.

The Comptroller of the Treasury, upon a hearing before that Department, recommended that no duplicate issue, for the reason that no one except Ruth March is known to have knowledge as to whether she assigned the bond when she was mentally competent to do so.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the Speaker announced that the amendments were agreed to.

Mr. BAILEY. Mr. Speaker, I demand the yeas and nays on the amendments.

Mr. PAYNE. I will say to the gentleman from Texas that when this bill is disposed of, and one or two other matters, I will make a motion to adjourn.

Mr. BAILEY. Matters of unanimous consent?

Mr. PAYNE. Yes.

Mr. BAILEY. If the gentleman from New York will make a motion to adjourn, I will withdraw my demand for the yeas and nays. I have no desire to embarrass the passage of this bill, and I withdraw the demand for the yeas and nays.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Texas withdraws the demand for the yeas and nays, and the amendments are agreed to.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

The SPEAKER. The question is on the engrossment and third reading of the bill.

The bill was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the title will be amended.

There was no objection.

On motion of Mr. WEYMOUTH, a motion to reconsider the vote whereby the bill was passed was laid on the table.

Mr. BRUMM. Mr. Speaker, I call for the regular order.

DIPLOMATIC APPROPRIATION BILL.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I have a conference report to present on the diplomatic appropriation bill.

The Clerk read the conference report, as follows:

The committee of conference on the disagreeing votes of the two Houses on the amendments of the Senate to the bill (H. R. 11487) making appropriations for the diplomatic and consular service for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900, having met, after full and free conference have agreed to recommend and do recommend to their respective Houses as follows:

That the Senate recede from its amendments numbered 7, 13, and 17.

That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendments of the Senate numbered 1, 2, 3, 6, 9, 11, 12, 14, 15, 16, and 18, and agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 4: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 4, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the matter inserted by said amendment insert the following: "Third secretaries of embassies to Great Britain, France, and Germany, at $1,200 each, $3,600;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 5: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 5, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$63,400;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 8: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 8, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$429,500;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 10: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 10, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: Strike out the matter inserted by said amendment, and strike out line 2, page 17 of the bill, and insert in lieu of said line 2 the following: "Consuls at Palermo and Naples;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 19: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 19, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$2,600;" and the Senate agree to the same.

Amendment numbered 20: That the House recede from its disagreement to the amendment of the Senate numbered 20, and agree to the same with an amendment as follows: In lieu of the sum proposed insert "$105,170;" and the Senate agree to the same.

ROBERT R. HITT,
LEMUEL E. QUIGG,
HUGH A. DINSMORE,
Managers on the part of the House.

EUGENE HALE,
CHARLES J. FAULKNER,
Managers on the part of the Senate.

The statement is as follows:

Amount as passed House	$1,705,533.76
Increase by Senate	16,800.00
Amount as passed Senate	1,722,333.76
Reduction in conference	7,800.00
Amount as agreed to in conference	1,714,533.76

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, if there be explanation desired of the very clear report of the committee of conference, I will state that the conferees, adhering as far as they could to the action of the House, have obtained a reduction from the changes made by the Senate (which amounted to about $16,000 increase) to about half that sum; and the items are these, to make a simple, plain story of the changes to which we have assented: Three secretaries of legation in South America—at the Argentine Republic, Venezuela, and Peru—are changed from $1,500 to $1,800 per annum, or $300 each. The reasons are probably manifest to anyone who knows those countries. Three third secretaries of embassies—one to London, one to Paris, and one to Berlin—are provided at salaries of $1,200 each. As the Senate had passed the bill these salaries were $1,600. We thought that $1,200, the amount which the Secretary of State had recommended in the estimates, would be sufficient, at least for the first time that we try these officers. There seems to be urgent pressure by these embassies for this assistance.

Mr. BAILEY. Does the gentleman mean to have the House understand that each of these embassies has already two secretaries and this is a provision for a third?

Mr. HITT. This provides a third secretary for each of those three embassies.

Mr. BAILEY. And they have just as much use for them as I have for a third arm.

Mr. HITT. The chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations of the Senate, who has just returned from the Paris conference, stated to the conferees this morning that there was need at each of them for another man, and more force at the consulate.

Mr. BAILEY. I think I know enough about the foreign service of other governments in this country to know that their officers spend about two-thirds of their time in social affairs, and I feel sure that there is no need for this third secretary in these legations.

Mr. HITT. Well, I will not controvert the gentleman's knowledge of foreign legations and embassies in this city, as he is undoubtedly much more familiar with the social world and its duties than I am. [Laughter.] But concerning our embassies abroad I have some personal knowledge, as I served for nearly seven years as secretary of legation at Paris, and I know that we were sometimes obliged to work until 11 o'clock at night.

The duties of these embassies are really serious and considerable. A matter which I might bring to the gentleman's attention, because he is not perhaps aware of it, is this: There frequently arise in the business of those three embassies questions of personal liberty and personal right touching naturalized and other American citizens, and in dealing with such questions our officials have no limitation of business hours.

The whole country would be indignant in case of a neglect of the rights of an American citizen falsely imprisoned or in any way suffering injury in a foreign country. We have millions of foreign-born citizens in the United States. They go constantly in considerable numbers to revisit their native countries, as they have the right to go. They are frequently claimed for military service. Their rights are often infringed, and many times we had to come to the aid of American citizens—poor, humble men who needed advice and could not employ counsel—men who were imprisoned or were seized under some ancient law, and I have aided in extricating them. And I believe it is just as much the duty of our representatives abroad to take care of such people as of those who have great fortunes.

Mr. BAILEY. No one would controvert the statement just made by the gentleman from Illinois; and I will say I believe he is perfectly sincere in what he says. But, in the first place, the secretaries are not the men to take care of the personal liberties of those people; that is the duty of the men commissioned to represent the United States.

The gentleman has attempted to be a little ironical about my knowledge of social affairs, about which I confess I know nothing, and about which I acknowledge he knows everything, because he takes part in those affairs twenty times where I never do at all. I was never at one of these social entertainments, where he is always a welcome visitor.

Mr. HITT. "The lady doth protest too much."

Mr. BAILEY. I repeat, I was never at one of those entertainments at which the gentleman is always welcome. But it is left even to the plain people of this country to read the newspapers; and if the newspapers report the matter aright, there is hardly an evening when these gentlemen who are sent here to represent foreign governments do not perform their duties at some social function. Now, that may be a part of their duties—I do not assume to know. The gentleman has been of that class, and he doubtless does know. He knows how far it is the duty of a diplomat to serve his country by the social conventionalities.

I have never understood that. I do not know that to be true; but I do know it is true, if the newspapers report the matter aright, that nearly every evening of the time we are here these gentlemen either invite somebody to their houses or are invited to the houses of somebody else. And if that is true, it is utterly impossible that any of those embassies should need three secretaries to attend to their business, unless the secretaries attend to the whole business of the legation. How many secretaries does the gentleman from Illinois use? How many can he use? I find no more than time enough to use one, and very frequently I have to make him come two or three times before I am ready to use his services. I undertake to say that any gentleman in this House who is performing his duty as a member of Congress conscientiously and constantly has not time to attend social affairs and then use three secretaries besides.

And, Mr. Speaker, I am morally certain that this is simply an addition to the staff of these ambassadors that will afford some clever young gentlemen, familiar with the etiquette of courts and with social connections, new and desirable positions.

But I presume, of course, that a plain, old-fashioned American Democrat, who knows nothing of such things, has no right to question a proposition of this kind. [Laughter.]

Mr. HITT. If the gentleman from Texas will permit me, his remarks relate entirely to the embassies of foreign countries which are located in this city——

Mr. BAILEY. But I am sure the gentleman from Illinois would not be so undiplomatic as to say, or even intimate, that the representatives of this Government in foreign countries were more conscientious than the representatives of foreign governments in this city.

Mr. HITT. Mr. Speaker, I will not trench on the question suggested by the gentleman. I hardly think it is a proper one to comment upon. I make no criticism as to how the representatives at Washington of other countries serve their governments. I am dealing with a question relating to our own foreign service.

I know something of the duties of our servants abroad—those who are engaged in the diplomatic service of this country in other lands. Their duties are serious, perplexing, and often exceedingly exacting. And the gentleman from Texas is mistaken when he allows himself to be misled by the use of the title "secretary" in assuming that the secretary is merely employed as a sort of scribe for the minister. He often has very different duties to perform. It is the secretary who is sent to get a man out of prison. It is the secretary who is sent to the different departments of the foreign governments to look after the rights of our citizens who are often in positions of great trouble, and usually the trouble is greater with those who are the poorest and least able to help themselves.

I found in my own experience that the duties of secretary were of a grave, perplexing, and intricate nature. The minister with whom I served when I went abroad, Mr. Washburne, had been so long a member of this body that he became "the father of the House," and was called "the watchdog of the Treasury." This title and his falling mantle were subsequently borne by the gentleman from Indiana, Mr. Holman, so long recognized as the "watchdog" of the Treasury.

He was a careful, conscientious, painstaking man, and his recommendations in regard to such matters are worthy of consideration. I served under him for several years as secretary of legation. His first duty, his first care, was always to look after the rights and interests of the people of the United States. The dinner parties and receptions to which the gentleman has referred occupied but a small portion of his time——

Mr. BAILEY (interrupting). Will the gentleman from Illinois allow me to ask in this connection how many secretaries that wise man had?

Mr. HITT. He had two allowed him by law, and often another for whose services he provided himself, out of his own pocket.

Mr. BAILEY. That is to say he had three in all?

Mr. HITT. Yes, and needed them all in the performance of his duties.

Mr. BAILEY. Then, if the gentleman will permit me, I will be much more civil with him than he was with me. [Laughter.] On that statement I think he was right and I was wrong, and I withdraw the objection. [Applause.]

Mr. HITT. I spoke only of what I knew to be a fact in connection with the duties performed.

Mr. BAILEY. And I accept your statement.

Mr. HITT. The Secretary of State—the present Secretary—has returned but recently from duties as ambassador at London and says that this increase is urgently needed for the performance of the work there.

I will only say further to the gentleman from Texas that this is really a practical question; that hundreds of American citizens, especially naturalized citizens, are liable to get into trouble and often do, and need the protection afforded by our representatives abroad.

Mr. BAILEY (interrupting). Troubles which they might largely have avoided if they had stayed closer at home.

Mr. HITT. Oh, well, they were not born in Texas. They were born over there and wanted to see their old country again. If they had been born in Texas it would have been different.

Mr. BAILEY. Their misfortune is that they were not born in Texas. [Laughter.]

Mr. HITT. They showed their good taste when they became American citizens.

Mr. BAILEY. I want to say to the gentleman from Illinois that I stand ready, as much as any man here or elsewhere, to provide, without reference to the expense, all the men and all the means that may be necessary to protect the humblest American citizen in any country on this globe.

Mr. HITT. That is a good doctrine. Vote for it.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the conference report.

Mr. HITT. I have not finished this luminous explanation, but I am ready for a vote. [Laughter.]

The conference report was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. HITT, a motion to reconsider the last vote was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. PAYNE. Mr. Speaker——

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. BRUMM. I call for the regular order.

Mr. PAYNE. I move that the House do now adjourn.

Mr. BRUMM. One moment, Mr. Speaker; a parliamentary inquiry. I was recognized by the Chair when I called for the regular order, and while I was on my feet I was taken off the floor by the conference report. I now ask whether I am not in order in making my motion?

The SPEAKER. In the order of precedence the motion to adjourn would have to be put first.

Mr. BRUMM. Am I not in order to make a motion which I have not yet completed?

The SPEAKER. The gentleman called for the regular order.

Mr. BRUMM. I called for the regular order, and had partly moved that we go into Committee of the Whole.

The SPEAKER. If the gentleman had even made that motion, the motion to adjourn would be in order.

Mr. BRUMM. If the Chair so decides——

Mr. PAYNE. I have no objection to considering the motion of the gentleman from Pennsylvania as pending.

Mr. DOCKERY. I have an objection.

Mr. BRUMM. If the Chair decides that I can be taken off my feet——

The SPEAKER. It is not a question of the gentleman being taken off his feet. It is a question of priority of motion, and the motion to adjourn would be in order even if the gentleman from Pennsylvania had made his motion and the Chair had submitted it to the House, instead of which the gentleman simply called for the regular order. The gentleman from New York [Mr. PAYNE] moves that the House do now adjourn.

The question being taken, on a division (demanded by Mr. GIBSON) there were—ayes 105, noes 19.

Mr. GIBSON. I ask for the yeas and nays.

The question being taken on ordering the yeas and nays, seven members, not a sufficient number, voted in favor thereof.

Accordingly the yeas and nays were refused.

REPRINT OF A REPORT.

Pending the announcement of the result, by unanimous consent, on motion of Mr. STONE, a reprint was ordered of Report No. 1876 on the substitute for the bill (H. R. 11917) to define and fix the standard of value and to regulate coinage and to provide for redemption thereunder, and for other purposes.

LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

By unanimous consent, leave of absence was granted as follows:

To Mr. CONNELL, for ten days, on account of important business.

To Mr. BROSIUS, for two days, on account of important business.

The motion of Mr. PAYNE was agreed to.

Accordingly (at 2 o'clock and 55 minutes p. m.) the House adjourned.

RELATIONS WITH PORTO RICO AND THE PHILIPPINES.

Mr. ALLEN. I submit a resolution, which I ask may be read.

The resolution was read, as follows:

Resolved, That the Senate of the United States, in ratifying and confirming the treaty of Paris, does not commit itself or the Government to the doctrine that the islands acquired by virtue of the war with Spain are to be annexed to or become a part of the United States, and that the difference in the language of said treaty as respects the island of Cuba and its inhabitants and the island of Porto Rico and Philippine Islands and their inhabitants shall not be construed or be held to be a difference in effect, but that it is the intention and purpose of the Senate in ratifying said treaty to place the inhabitants of the Philippine Islands and Porto Rico in exactly the same position as respects their relations to the United States as are the inhabitants of Cuba.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President, just a word.

Mr. CHANDLER. I must object to debate.

Mr. ALLEN. I do not ask to have the resolution considered this morning. I simply desire to make a brief statement, and then I will yield the floor.

Mr. CHANDLER. Very well, if the Senator does not intend to debate the resolution.

Mr. ALLEN. Not at all; not now.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Senator from Nebraska will proceed.

Mr. ALLEN. I merely desire to say that I should like to have the resolution passed over until Monday morning, when I trust the Senate will convene sufficiently early to give me an opportunity to submit some remarks in its support. Understanding that this morning the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON] and the Senator from Colorado [Mr. WOLCOTT] desire to speak, I have yielded the right that I would otherwise have to have the resolution considered, and I give notice that on Monday morning, at the convening of the Senate, I shall submit some remarks in support of the resolution.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The resolution will go over.

POLICY REGARDING THE PHILIPPINE ISLANDS.

Mr. BACON. Mr. President, I desire to give notice that at the first moment when the Senate is in legislative session and the floor is not occupied, by the courtesy of the Senate, I shall ask the Senate to take up and consider the joint resolution which I have introduced relative to the policy of the Government in the Philippine Islands.

HOUSE BILL REFERRED.

The bill (H. R. 2374) authorizing the Secretary of the Treasury to issue a duplicate bond to Benjamin H. March, executor of the last will and testament of Ruth March, deceased, was read twice by its title, and referred to the Committee on Finance.

ACQUISITION OF TERRITORY.

Mr. CHANDLER. I ask that Senate joint resolution 191 may be taken up in order that the Senator from Texas may proceed with his remarks.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. The Chair lays before the Senate the joint resolution.

The SECRETARY. A joint resolution (S. R. 191) declaring that under the Constitution of the United States no power is given to the Federal Government to acquire territory to be held and governed permanently as colonies.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the pending treaty of peace between the United States and Spain, which has been made public by order of the Senate, contains three main articles. By Article I Spain relinquishes all claim of title to Cuba. By Article II Spain cedes to the United States the island of Porto Rico and other islands under Spanish sovereignty in the West Indies and the island of Guam in the Ladrones. By Article III Spain makes cession of the archipelago known as the Philippine Islands and the United States agree to pay Spain $20,000,000.

There are other dependent articles, the most important of which is, probably, Article VII, by which the two Governments relinquish all claim for indemnity on the part of either Government or its citizens against the other Government arising out of the troubles in Cuba, and in which the United States agree to settle such claims on the part of our citizens against Spain. This may develop into an obligation of many millions against our Government. The amount has not been estimated with any approximate accuracy.

Mr. President, the first two articles of the treaty present no difficulties. We are satisfied with a relinquishment of Cuba to its own people. Few Senators object to taking a cession of Porto Rico, which lies in the Western Hemisphere. The island of Guam, in the Ladrones, is not more than two or three times as large as the District of Columbia, and contains a population of only four or five thousand. It is a convenient size for a coaling and naval station, and we would have no perplexities of government for future settlement.

The article relating to the Philippines is the one upon which our differences of opinion turn.

Mr. President, I am not an anti-expansionist. I believe that it is the duty and the interest of this country to widen its boundaries as time goes on. But I would not do this indiscriminately. In case of doubt, I would adhere closely to the policy of the forefathers.

In my judgment the taking of the Philippines will bring peril both to the interests and the institutions of the American people. It is not an acquisition which will add to the comfort and glory of the Republic like that of Louisiana, or Florida, or Texas, or New Mexico and California.

It seems to me a matter of astonishment that such a radical far-reaching responsibility should be courted upon the scantiness of the information which we possess in regard to the subject-matter of our acquisition.

Perhaps no Senator upon this floor ever set foot upon the Philippine Islands, and few will claim that they possess that grasp upon the case which they would feel necessary in an important private transaction.

We know in a general way that there are from 1,200 to 1,800 islands in the Philippine group, that four or five hundred of them are inhabited, and that the remainder are so barren that they contain not a single soul. We know that there are from 7,000,000 to 12,000,000 people upon them. My own opinion is that there are nearer 7,000,000 than 12,000,000, because we know how customary it is to exaggerate the population of the Eastern nations.

There is no homogeneity among those people. Some have never been under the actual sovereignty of Spain. The natives represent all grades of society from rank savages to the semicivilized children of Spanish and Chinese fathers and native Malay mothers. A large number of full-blooded Chinamen and a mere handful of Germans, English, and Spaniards are there.

Now, the first thing to be done after the United States went into the Philippines would be to bring the islands under settled rule. We would have to do what Spain, after two hundred years of trial, with all the instrumentalities of tyranny at her command, has been unable to do.

If we will confine our operations to Porto Rico and Cuba, no additions to our present Regular Army will be necessary. We need but few soldiers inside the present borders of the United States, and our existing military force can be spared largely for Porto Rico and Cuba. Porto Rico is small in area and at peace. That island can be policed by two or three companies of good soldiers. Nor is there great danger in Cuba.

The fact of the proximity of the United States to the West Indies, that our great power hangs over the islands like a mountain side, the hopelessness of making headway against this Government, will deter those in Porto Rico and Cuba who might otherwise be factors in disturbance from doing anything in opposition to our just plans.

But, sir, when we go to the Philippine Islands a different problem is thrust upon us. We will need a standing army of European proportions, and with that standing army will come vast consequences of present and future expense. We will have retired lists for Army and Navy officers expanding faster than our boundaries expand; we will have pensions piled on pensions to the latest generation; we will have our minds constantly fixed upon visions of war and conquest rather than peace and industrial advancement, and for years the Pacific cables will bring bloody news to the homes of America.

After we have subjected those islands under great stress and great expense to the Government of our country, what a complexity of social and political problems is brought to our doors? Take, for example, the labor problem?

There are two distinct dangers which it is hardly possible to avert. Those dangers are, first, the competition of the pauper laborers of the Philippine Islands who may come to our shores. The second is the danger of the competition of the pauper-made products sent out from the Philippine Islands to flood and disparage American markets.

It is hardly material to the consideration of this question whether the Filipinos become citizens or not when they are admitted into the bounds of our Republic. All persons who are within the jurisdiction of this country have the free right of locomotion from one part of our dominion to another. Would it be within the power of Congress to say that an alien peacefully resident here should not go from one of our Territories to another?

We can keep aliens from coming here. That is a function of our sovereignty. We can expel aliens after they come here. That is a function of our sovereignty. But we have no power to interfere with the personal liberty of an alien as long as he remains within our borders.

Mr. HOAR. Mr. President, I would remind my honorable friend that even the assertion of the constitutional power to expel an alien was regarded as so hostile to the spirit of American institutions that it revolutionized the Government, it overthrew an administration.

Mr. CHILTON. True.

I will not speak at length of the question whether the sons and daughters of the Filipinos would become citizens of this country. The Supreme Court of the United States, in a case as late as the one hundred and sixty-ninth volume, had occasion to consider the status of a child born of Chinese parents living in the United States.

It was said that no matter what the condition of the father may have been, the very fact of birth inside the jurisdiction of the United States gave the boy the right to free admission into our territory. The only exceptions to that rule are the cases of alien enemies in time of war and ambassadors and ministers here on official business. In that case, after discussing other propositions, the court refers to an earlier case. I read from 169 United States, 700:

> In Lem Moon Sing vs. United States the same principles were reaffirmed, and were applied to a Chinese person, born in China, who had acquired a commercial domicile in the United States, and who, having voluntarily left the country on a temporary visit to China, and with the intention of returning to and continuing his residence in this country, claimed the right under a statute or treaty to reenter it; and the distinction between the right of an alien to the protection of the Constitution and laws of the United States for his person and property while within the jurisdiction thereof, and his claim of a right to reenter the United States, after a visit to his native land, was expressed by the court as follows:
> "He is none the less an alien because of his having a commercial domicile in this country. While he lawfully remains here, he is entitled to the benefit of the guarantees of life, liberty, and property, secured by the Constitution to all persons, of whatever race, within the jurisdiction of the United States. His personal rights"—

That is, the alien's—

> "when he is in this country, and such of his property as is here during his absence, are as fully protected by the supreme law of the land as if he were a native or naturalized citizen of the United States."

Blackstone lays down that great principle of Anglo-Saxon progress that one of the first attributes of personal liberty is the right of locomotion from one part of the domain to another. And upon original principles, as well as American authority, it is fairly deducible that whenever we take the Filipinos under our jurisdiction the Supreme Court will hold that it is beyond the power of Congress to prevent them from passing between different parts of the territory of the United States. That has been the common construction of our Constitution for the last one hundred years.

But suppose that danger could be safeguarded by legislation. Where under our Constitution would you find the authority to keep the productions of the Filipinos, manufactured in their own homes, from coming unimpeded to the ports of the United States? In Loughborough vs. Blake (5 Wheat., 317), Chief Justice Marshall, speaking for the court, said:

> The eighth section of the first article [of the Constitution] gives to Congress the "power to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises," for the purposes thereinafter mentioned. This grant is general, without limitation as to place. It consequently extends to all places over which the Government extends.

That is strong enough.

> The power, then, to lay and collect duties, imposts, and excises, may be exercised, and must be exercised throughout the United States. Does this term designate the whole, or any particular portion of the American empire?

He then goes on to answer the question:

> It [the United States] is the name given to our great Republic, which is composed of States and Territories. The District of Columbia or the territory west of the Missouri is not less within the United States than Maryland or Pennsylvania; and it is not less necessary, on the principles of our Constitution, that uniformity in the imposition of imposts, duties, and excises should be observed in the one than in the other.

The idea was advanced here a few days ago that Congress possessed a higher power over unorganized territory than that which it had over organized Territories; but when this decision was rendered the greater part of the territory west of the Missouri River, to which Chief Justice Marshall referred, was unorganized territory. This language applies to all the territory, as he says, which belongs to the United States.

The same principle is practically outlined in the case of Cross vs. Harrison, 16 Howard. From a consideration of these opinions and the nature of our Government and institutions, it would seem clear that whenever any territory is brought within this American "empire," so called, it becomes subject to the same constitutional principles which limit Congress in regard to that which we now possess.

I can not believe that it will be within the power of Congress to prescribe a rate of duty on foreign goods brought into the Philippine Islands differing from the duty on same goods when brought into Texas, Maine, or California, nor can national legislation fix a tariff on importations which pass from the Philippine Islands to other parts of this country higher than the tax on importations which pass from the Territory of Arizona or the District of Columbia into any existing State or Territory.

Mr. President, the laboring people of this country have caught the alarm. They understand the nature of this grave and radical departure.

Mr. FORAKER. Will the Senator from Texas allow me to interrupt him and ask him a question?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

Mr. FORAKER. Do I understand the Senator to contend that the constitutional provision requiring uniformity in the levying of impost duties would apply to importations from the Philippines into other States and Territories of the United States?

Mr. CHILTON. Undoubtedly, reasoning from the decisions of the Supreme Court.

Mr. FORAKER. I call the Senator's attention to the fact that the term "duties upon imports and exports," as used in the Constitution of the United States, has been held by the Supreme Court to apply only to imports and exports from and to foreign countries, and not to imports and exports from one State to another or from one Territory to another of the United States. Therefore that rule of the Constitution would have no application at all to exports into this country from the Philippine Islands if they should be made a part of the United States, and no application whatever to transactions between the United States and the Philippine Islands; and it would be competent for any State of the Union, if it saw fit to do so, to protect itself in any way it might see fit by the levying of import duties upon importations from the Philippine Islands.

If the Senator will allow me, I will call his attention to a case reported in 8 Wallace. The Senator may have overlooked it. It is the case of Woodruff vs. Parham, where it was held by the Supreme Court, reading only from the syllabus:

The term "import," as used in that clause of the Constitution which says that "no State shall levy any imposts or duties on imports or exports," does not refer to articles imported from one State into another, but only to articles imported from foreign countries into the United States.

And the court, in this opinion, went on to say that wherever the term "imports or exports" is used in the Constitution relation is had to foreign importations and exportations and not to transactions between the States or Territories of the United States. Therefore, imports from the Philippines that would be prejudicial to labor would not be beyond the reach of Congress to regulate.

Mr. CHILTON. I differ with the Senator in regard to that proposition.

Mr. FORAKER. I am only stating what the Supreme Court has held.

Mr. CHILTON. I can not concede that the case referred to decided the question here involved. It arose under the clause of the Constitution limiting the levying of duties by States. Even in that aspect it has been superseded by later decisions holding that taxes by one State on importations from another are void because they constitute a regulation of interstate commerce.

We are now speaking of the powers of Congress. Is it within the power of the Congress of the United States to declare that goods which come from Arizona to the District of Columbia shall pay a certain rate of duty or a certain rate of tax—I do not care what you call it—and that goods which come from Texas to the District of Columbia shall pay another rate? Certainly not.

I will quote part of section 8, Article I, of the Constitution:

* * * but all duties, imposts, and excises shall be uniform throughout the United States.

Now, if a tax should be laid on goods brought from Manila to San Francisco or New York, even if not a duty or impost, it would fall within the definition of the word "excise," and would be invalid if higher than like excises on goods from other ports of our country to New York or San Francisco.

But I was about to show the views of our labor organizations in regard to this question. I received lately a protest from one of these bodies, which I will read in part:

The undersigned delegates desire to present briefly the reasons why the Cigar Makers' International Union of America, an organization composed of 31,500 members, located in 357 cities and towns, is opposed to the annexation of the Philippine Islands by the United States.

I. Because the bulk of the cigars manufactured in the Philippine Islands are sold at a price of $5 to $10 per thousand in United States currency. This statement is verified by Edward W. Harden, special commissioner, in his report on the financial and industrial conditions of said country (page 23).

II. Because the exportation of cigars in 1896 from Manila amounted to 194,136,000, which, within a few years, under American energy and direction, would increase to the extent of endangering our home industry.

III. Because the cheap labor of the islands, subsisting mostly on rice and vegetables, would enable a few manufacturers to flood the United States with this product, thus tending to paralyze our home market.

IV. Because the development of the industry in the archipelago would throw thousands of Americans employed at making cigars out of work and reduce the standard of wages to the Asiatic level, which averages from 15 cents to 25 cents per day.

V. Because all barriers that now limit competition between these producing forces would be swept aside, and new conditions created most disastrous to the moral, social, and material welfare of the American working people.

VI. Because the annexation of the Philippine Islands will not change the Asiatic habits and customs of the laboring population, but will, in course of time, reduce the American standard of living to a level bordering on pauperism.

VII. Because the welfare of 150,000 employees and small manufacturers and their families, depending upon this industry for a living in the United States, is of vastly more importance to the nation than the increase of commerce expected by a few commercial centers.

VIII. Because it would nullify, in substance, the Chinese exclusion act, the alien contract labor law, and immigration laws, for which organized labor has contended for the last twenty-five years.

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Mr. President, I do not want to interrupt the Senator or delay him, but I do wish just at this point to say that after a very careful study of the situation I am firmly of the belief that none of the natives can come from the Philippine Islands into the United States unless Congress gives permission, nor can any free goods come from there into the United States unless Congress provides for it.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, the Senator from Connecticut can not speak for the Supreme Court of the United States. The laboring people of this country will hardly have a sufficient guaranty in his emphatic contention on this subject. So long as the Philippine people are held in allegiance to the Government of the United States you can not deny them the rights which belong to other persons who owe allegiance to our Government. Congress has no power to make discriminations between the people who owe a common obligation to a common Federal sovereignty. This Government was founded upon the proposition that all who served the Republic should have equality of right.

And why are we asked to take up these puzzles? Why are we asked to run the risk of admitting large numbers of Chinese and crossbreeds of Chinese and Mestizos into this Republic, to say nothing of the vast Malay millions which stand behind them? In the Philippine Islands to-day are more than 500,000 Chinese and descendants of Chinese. They mainly inhabit the city of Manila and other towns.

Those people are laborers, merchants, and traders, and when we open the doors by the annexation of these islands we will bring into competition with our home people more alien pauper laborers than would come here in a hundred years under the ordinary operation of our immigration laws. And for what? For islands which, in my judgment, have been vastly exaggerated in fertility and value. The sensational journals of this country have saturated the public mind with the idea that if we give up the Philippine Islands we will give up a mine of wealth and an opportunity never to return again.

My investigations do not confirm these highly colored estimates. The commerce of the Philippines would no doubt improve under the touch of American energy, but at best it would make but a small figure in our national resources. The imports and exports of the United States are now more in a day than the imports and exports of the Philippines are in a year.

Men may deceive themselves by daydreams about securing a great trade in China and Japan from the standpoint of the Philippines. But I have seen town-lot booms before. I have seen sober men intoxicate themselves with visions of railroads whose charters alone tell the story of their existence and of great cities which the census taker never found.

A widening commerce with those far-off lands should ever be an object of our care. The gallant Perry, in old Democratic days, was the first man to unlock the doors of Japan to American trade.

But to propel that commerce it is not necessary to assume the responsibility of governmental administration.

I would not have this Government surrender all the advantages which come from our glorious Eastern victory. I would ask one or more coaling and naval stations in the Philippines, so that hereafter, if we had unwilling trouble upon the sea, we might have a base of operations in that quarter of the world.

But I would rather have a treaty which gave free entry to American productions—yes, ten thousand times rather have it—than a profitless and never quiet sovereignty of the ignorant and mixed millions of the Philippines.

Mr. CAFFERY. Will the Senator permit me?

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). Does the Senator from Texas yield to the Senator from Louisiana?

Mr. CHILTON. Yes, sir.

Mr. CAFFERY. If the contention of the Senator from Connecticut [Mr. PLATT] be correct, and the Philippines come absolutely under the sovereignty of Congress, and are not citizens of the United States, what kind of political status have they? Have they any rights?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. Just what Congress pleases to give them under the treaty.

Mr. CAFFERY. I would, then, ask the Senator whether, if that be true in regard to the Philippines, it is not true with regard to the inhabitants of New Mexico or any other Territory of the United States?

Mr. PLATT of Connecticut. I do not wish to interfere with the Senator from Texas [Mr. CHILTON], but I will say with regard to the inhabitants of the Territories of New Mexico and Arizona, we have by public statute made the Constitution and laws of the United States applicable there. That makes the distinction.

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, I have looked into that question carefully. According to that theory, all we have to do to withdraw the protection of the Constitution from the people of Arizona and New Mexico is to repeal that statute; and I do not believe for one moment that the personal rights of the people who inhabit the Territories of this country depend upon any such slender foundation.

Mr. NELSON. May I ask the Senator a question?

Mr. CHILTON. Certainly.

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Senators desiring to interrupt a Senator on the floor will please get consent from the Chair.

Mr. NELSON. I desire to ask the Senator from Texas a practical question, not for the purpose of interrupting him. When we annexed Alaska did all the Indians and natives of that country become citizens of the United States, or what was the condition of the natives of that country after they were annexed?

Mr. CHILTON. Mr. President, under our Constitution the Indians occupy a peculiar situation, and no decision and no argument founded upon the relation of the American Indian to the people of this country and to our Constitution is worth anything whatever.

Mr. President, I have spoken of the internal difficulties which will present themselves. In my judgment, they form but the smallest part of the gravity of this situation. Whenever we go over into the Philippine Islands great external problems will loom up. What becomes of our Monroe doctrine? What is that Monroe doctrine? It is a beautiful principle, which blends the interests of all the people of the American republics to the south of us with the interests of this great nation.

Under that Monroe doctrine, to which this country has been pledged in every conceivable way, and which took its place in the international law when President Cleveland issued his celebrated warning to England which brought that great Empire to agree to an arbitration with the Venezuelan Republic upon the question of boundary—we say to the world that the Western Hemisphere shall constitute a section of the earth with which the mighty powers of Europe shall have no concern. In the interest of peace the United States will not dislodge European colonies already established, but their boundaries are fixed. Neither by war, purchase, voluntary cession, vote of the people, nor in any conceivable way shall a single foot of new territory upon this hemisphere be added to European dominion.

In some respects this is a hard doctrine, but it is a doctrine of virtue and necessity. To say to all the great powers of Europe that they will never be permitted to take in territory anywhere in North, South, or Central America is something to touch the pride of kings and emperors across the water.

Suppose that Germany should have a conflict with Brazil, and her war ships should lay siege to and capture Rio Janeiro, as Manila was captured by us.

If then the Brazilian Government, in order to make a peace, were to propose to cede Rio Janeiro to Germany as a part of the settlement. Could she do it? No. At that moment the great, strong voice of the American Republic would speak to the German Government, "Stay thy hand, for we are sworn that no government of the Old World shall ever hereafter acquire another foot of soil upon the domain of the New."

Mr. PETTUS. By force?

Mr. CHILTON. No, sir; not by force alone. The Monroe doctrine goes further. The principal is universal in its sweep and interdicts every species of acquisition by European powers.

It would be hard to find a citizen of the Union who would give up that Monroe doctrine.

We will say to the powers of the Old World, "We will not allow you to acquire further possessions in the Western Hemisphere. Yet we will take Ptoro Rico, and we reserve the right to take Haiti or Brazil or Cuba or any other part of North or South America when we think proper to do so."

But after saying this, after reserving that liberty, will we go across into Asia and enter into a wolfish rivalry for land, and will we take and keep all that we feel disposed to take and keep? Mr. President, all the moral power of the Monroe doctrine will disappear whenever we are brought to that extremity.

There is a corollary from the Monroe doctrine which is stated by President Monroe himself and the other great statesmen of America. That deduction is that, while we will not allow the governments of the Old World to add any further territory to their present colonies on this side of the water, neither will we take a hand in the affairs of the Old World, and when we abandon that position and go over into the Eastern Hemisphere we will discredit the Monroe doctrine during all time. The principle will have been extracted; its truth and loftiness will have been lost, and it will become simply a doctrine of brute force on the part of the United States.

Again, Mr. President, when we go over into the Philippines we have thrown ourselves upon the red-hot stove of international politics in the Eastern Hemisphere. When we go we find, in the first place, that governments over there do not settle matters, each for itself. You find over there what is known as the "Concert of Europe." A short time ago Greece had a war with Turkey. Turkey overran Greece; and had it in her power to force terms upon the Grecian monarchy.

But the powers of Europe took a hand. Russia, Germany, England, France, Austria, and Italy, forming the concert of Europe, intervened, and they said, "We are going to have something to say about how this treaty of peace shall be made." They demanded that the treaty of peace be settled according to certain principles; "the balance of power must be conserved;" and so Turkey, after she had won a conclusive victory over Greece, was obliged to submit to a treaty which was dictated by the six great powers of Europe.

So after the war between Russia and Turkey a few years ago, Russia was victorious and began to outline the terms of peace, but a dark figure loomed up—the concert of Europe—England, Germany, France, Austria, and Italy. A congress was called at Berlin, a famous congress in the diplomatic history of the world. Beaconsfield and Bismarck and other great statesmen representing the countries of Europe were there, and though Russia had overpowered Turkey in actual battle, the treaty of peace was made upon compromise terms acceptable to the other great powers.

Now, when we go into the Philippine Islands we become close neighbors to Russia, Germany, England, and France, and we will no more be satisfied with what we have than they are. Some American statesman will rise up and say we are as much entitled to a share of China as they are, and we will have the power to take what we want. Then we will be invited to a conference with the powers of Europe.

Mr. President, do you suppose the people of this country would submit to that? No. We never would agree to submit the result of our victories in war to the arbitration of other nations, and our position would be certain to lead to hostile contests between the United States and the powers of the Old World. We would be on the rim of difficulty all the time.

When we go to the Philippine Islands, we take our place on the Sea of China. France is there, England is there, Russia is there, Germany is there. Trouble will be certain to ensue, and it will not be long in coming. In my judgment twenty years will not elapse until we will be driven into hostile conflict with one or all the great European nations.

What will be the main theater of the war? Where will the fighting take place? Inevitably in Chinese waters or upon Chinese territory.

Now, I have great faith in the energy, in the ability, and in the strength of the American people. I know our resources are tremendous. But we must never lose sight of the important fact that one of the reasons why the other nations of the earth have heretofore been unwilling and unable to measure arms with the United States is because of the fact that we have stood here in a great continental area and serenity, and the countries of the Old World could not find a place to strike us. They dared not seek to invade us, and hence they shrank from encountering the dangers of a war with this Republic.

But whenever we take the Philippine Islands we have furnished to the world a place to strike us. It will be our one weak point. If we enter into an alliance with England, as is proposed here by some, we will have to take part in the division of China or take side against the partition of China. In either case we will be obliged to go across the sea and fight our future battles with the powers of the Old World at a place which they and not we will select.

In such a contest we will be at great disadvantage. A Russian Government railroad will soon be finished from St. Petersburg to the Pacific Ocean and Sea of China. It will be within the power of the Russian Empire to send train load after train load of soldiers from St. Petersburg—its capital—to its remotest limits, and debark them close to the Philippines or upon the soil of China. We can not transport our soldiers by railroad. We will load ships at San Francisco or at some other American port, and send our soldiers across the Pacific Ocean, make a landing, and then measure arms with the continental powers of the Eastern Hemisphere. The difference of facilities would be against us in proportions so tremendous that I shrink from such an undertaking.

Mr. President, we should take some observations from experience. I remember in reading history one very remarkable instance of the utter folly of enabling your adversary to select the theater of war. After Napoleon Bonaparte invaded Russia and left his army bleeding upon her plains of snow, no power in Europe dared to undertake another Russian invasion. For a half century Russia was deemed impregnable. But in an evil hour she set up certain rights upon the Black Sea. Then England and France saw their opportunity.

When Russia set up these rights upon the Black Sea, as a matter of course she had to enforce them. England and France found it in their power to select the place where the fighting should occur, and when the Crimean war ended Russia was forced to agree to a peace that cost her more prestige than any other event in her history.

It has been boldly avowed upon this floor that we should go into an alliance with England and fight Russia or Germany or any combination of European powers which should seek to partition the Chinese Empire. What does all that mean? It means war, indescribable, unending war. Why should we cast the American destiny upon a sea which is bound to bring our people into bloody conflict with the powers of the Old World? It is a dreadful responsibility to propose at this hour of our history.

The last civil war has already cost the people of the United States over $10,000,000,000; the wars of Europe during the present century have cost the people of Europe over $100,000,000,000, and the end is not yet. Shall we gather nothing from this experience? Shall we go headlong into a policy which has brought the European masses into a state almost equivalent to despair?

So dreadful has this burden grown that not long ago the Czar of Russia proposed a conference to consider plans for a general disarmament. We all know that no disarmament will take place. The powers of Europe must keep up great standing armies to watch each other. Why watch each other? Because they are in close neighborhood and every neighbor striving to gain advantage in territorial acquisition. What brought on the war between the United States and Spain? It was because of the neighborhood of Cuba to this country. If Cuba had been 7,000 miles away, we would never have had war with Spain, and no crisis such as that which now faces us would exist.

Now, whenever we go to the Philippine Islands we become neighbors to France, to Russia, and to Germany, and the very fact of our neighborhood will keep us perpetually in danger of conflict. But it is said, If all this be true, why is it that England, France, Germany, and other countries are engaged in a mad race for colonial territory? The reasons are many; some of them partly sound and others purely the result of imitation.

England and Germany have for a long time been vexed with the problem of a superabundant population. England has gone so far, at different times, as to actually assist immigration to the United States and other parts of the world.

France has been led into the same policy on the theory of finding new markets, but those who have studied the problem maturely believe that France has not gained and will not gain anything of solid value from her experiment.

Besides, these countries are not self-sustaining. They do not have, like the United States, such a variety of soil and climate that within their own borders one industry can exchange its products for that of the other and a comfortable living be made practicable for all without calling into requisition foreign trade.

England and Germany could not live without the wheat which comes from other countries. They could not thrive without the cotton which grows in other countries. The dependence of European nations upon the United States for these great staples of agricultural production has long been the subject of discontent among the thinkers who rule Eng ish and German affairs.

But why should England, Germany, and France be held up to the United States as objects of our imitation?

Are laborers paid better in England and Germany than they are in the United States? Are the masses of Europe more comfortable than the masses of this Republic?

If in the short period of our history we have reached a height of power far above that held by other civilized nations, why should we now take up their policies?

Where has the world ever witnessed such another record as that made by this Union under the fostering principles we are now about to abandon?

But, Mr. President, the question is asked with an air of confidence, as if it presented a difficulty which could not be overcome, "What are you going to do with the Philippines?" It is even claimed in debate that we possess only a choice of alternatives; on the one hand, to take the Philippines as a part of our territory, or, on the other, to leave them to the dominion of Spain. This is mere assumption. We should do neither one thing nor the other. If we were under no specific obligations to the present insurgent forces in the Philippines it would be our duty, in view of the principles so long and proudly held by the American Union, to provide for independent government by the people concerned and leave them to their just destiny.

But the case is still stronger. The evidence published in connection with the treaty shows conclusively that Aguinaldo and his forces were of steady, valuable support to the American commanders. The same evidence shows that these people looked upon themselves as the allies of the United States and believed faithfully that they were to be the beneficiaries of a joint success. I know not how it may impress others, but there seems to me something shameful in now turning to the Filipinos and saying to them, "You were not our allies: you were our tools; you were the victims of our diplomacy. We were merely using you, and our consuls and commanders were instructed privately not to commit this Government in a way which would deny us the privilege of ordering the fate of the Philippines without regard to your wishes."

Men talk about our moral duties to the world, about what we owe to England and to China and the peace of mankind, but it seems to me that a great nation of intelligence and power owes to a weak and trustful people like the Filipinos the duty of respecting our engagement with them in the same sense in which they understood it. There is no danger either to the peace of the world or the prestige of our Republic in taking this course.

It has been said upon this floor that if we aided the Philippine people to establish an independent government Germany, France, Russia, or England would seize these islands. But the truth is that this difficulty is entirely unreal.

It would be easy for us to treat the Philippine Islands as we treat Liberia. That Republic is not on the Western Hemisphere. We do not claim that it falls under the influence of the Monroe doctrine. It is located on the coast of Africa, where Germany, England, and France are pushing forward for new territory.

We never have undertaken to exercise the slightest sovereignty over Liberia. Yet we have had occasion to define a policy in regard to it. I read from Wharton's Digest of International Law, section 66, from a letter dated April 21, 1880, written by Mr. Evarts, while Secretary of State, to Mr. Hoppin:

> The United States are not averse to having the great powers know that they publicly recognize the peculiar relations between them and Liberia, and that they are prepared to take every proper step to maintain them. To this end it is not inexpedient that you, and Mr. Lowell also, on his return to his post from his present leave, should evince a lively interest in the movements of both Great Britain and France in the neighborhood of Liberia.

While Wharton does not publish the entire letter, I find, on examining the files of the State Department, a further expression in the same letter which may be usefully quoted here:

> The attitude of the European powers which may have established themselves in the vicinity of Liberia becomes of interest to the United States whenever it may assume a tendency to disparage the asserted rights of native self-control.

In 1884 a letter was written on the same general subject by Mr. Frelinghuysen, Secretary of State, to Mr. Roustan, the French minister. Wharton quotes a part of that letter also, as follows:

> Liberia, although not a colony of the United States—
> We claimed no jurisdiction over it whatever—
> began its independent career as an offshoot of this country, which bears to it a quasi-parental relationship, which authorizes the United States to interpose its good offices in any contest between Liberia and a foreign state, and a refusal to give the United States an opportunity to be heard for this purpose would make "an unfavorable impression in the minds of the Government and the people of the United States."

In the same letter it is said:

> It seems, however, proper that I should in the name of this Government advise you provisionally that the United States would consider a French claim to territory in the Mannah River as threatening the integrity and tranquillity of Liberia. I should, however, be most happy to learn that the report of French occupation of Kents Island is unfounded.

On another occasion, in 1880, Mr. Evarts, while Secretary of State, wrote a letter to Mr. Noyes, in which he called attention to the information which had been received here that the French Government had designs of establishing a protectorate over the Liberian Republic.

Mr. Noyes, the American minister to France, replied that on making inquiry he had discovered that there was no intention on the part of the French Government to institute a protectorate over Liberia. That letter was published in the volume of "Foreign Relations of the United States" for 1879, and Mr. Noyes, having ascertained in advance that it would be published, suggested that it was unnecessary to put the correspondence in print. But our Government declined to heed his suggestion, and it was said:

> It is therefore quite suitable that the great powers should know that the United States publicly recognize those relations which we bear to Liberia, and is prepared to take every proper step to maintain them.

Mr. President, our entire interest in Liberia has been put on the ground that it was settled by Africans who left this country, and a hint from us has never failed to arrest all designs cherished by European nations against this little Republic.

Now, if we go into the Philippine Islands and give those people their just inheritance of independence, our Government can say rightfully to the world that the people of the Philippine Islands established their liberty by aid of our arms; they sustained us in the war against Spain, and we shall therefore always regard them as objects of our parental care. Not one of the powers of Europe would dare to make the slightest aggression upon the independent government of the Philippines at the hazard of our displeasure.

The claim that we must either take the treaty as it is or subject ourselves to tremendous consequences of difficulty with Spain is another unreal conception in connection with this situation. Spain has no money, no navy, no hopes; and whenever the United States say, "You must make the same relinquishment in regard to the Philippine Islands that you have made in regard to Cuba," she will instantly yield to our pleasure and close up a war which has advertised alike her folly and weakness.

But Senators say we can attend to all these questions after we have ratified the treaty.

Mr. President, he is but a poor student of human nature who depends too much upon his own firmness of purpose in dealing with great and constant questions in a great and constant way. The people of the United States never have given up a foot of territory. The smallest acquisition becomes a matter of pride after it once becomes a part of the Republic. When two or five years from now it is proposed to give up the Philippines the Senator from Colorado [Mr. TELLER], or some other Senator, will rise to say that if you give them up Germany will take them, or England will take them, or Russia will take them, and you will always have this scarecrow of foreign interference in the affairs of the Philippine Islands to deter us from acting in the way our better judgment might suggest.

But if you will adopt a resolution or amendment to the treaty which explicitly defines our relation to those people, then you will have a fulcrum upon which the moral sentiment of this country can work. Even the boldest adventurer of expansion will feel abashed when reminded that we ought to give the Filipinos independent government because we solemnly promised to do so when we made the treaty with Spain.

Mr. SULLIVAN. Mr. President——

Mr. CHILTON. I want to get through so as to give the Senator from Colorado an opportunity to speak.

Mr. SULLIVAN. I wish merely to ask a question. How can you do that thing when objection is made to the consideration of a resolution?

Mr. CHILTON. That has all been explained. A resolution which shall be effective is now out of the question. We can amend the treaty; and if we do amend it, ratification will be certain.

Let us make no pretexts. Let us not trample upon the aspirations of the Philippine people to imitate the character of this Republic.

It is a stirring thing to read of great generals and heroic admirals, of sieges, battles, and victories, but after the music and the march have passed by, after the dance of delirium has worn us out, there will come a time of reckoning and mourning. I can but think of what will fall to our people in future years. After we have vindicated, by great sacrifice of the treasure and blood of America, our ability to measure arms with the powers of Europe in their schemes of colonization upon the Eastern Hemisphere, I feel that the good folks at home are going to be the sufferers for all time—sufferers in purse, sufferers in morals, sufferers in institutions.

I am one of those who believe in a Providence which cares for the destiny of collective millions. I feel that our toilers have outstripped all others and grown greater in a century than nations that have lived a thousand years, not alone because we have more energy and more brain than those who dwell in other lands, but because we have been the justest nation of all history. In this great crisis let us show to all hearts and all time that the American Republic still furnishes the world's best example of righteous rulers and a free people.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I ask unanimous consent that when the hour of 2 o'clock arrives the unfinished business may be considered as temporarily laid aside.

Mr. CHILTON. That follows without any consent. It follows as a matter of course.

Mr. LODGE. If the Senator will allow me, I make the request so that the Senator from Colorado may make his speech uninterrupted when the hour of 2 o'clock comes.

Mr. CHILTON. That follows, though, under the agreement made.

The PRESIDING OFFICER (Mr. GALLINGER in the chair). The Chair will take the liberty to lay before the Senate the unfinished business, and then it can be temporarily laid aside. It will be stated.

The SECRETARY. A bill (S. 1575) to amend an act entitled "An act to regulate commerce."

The PRESIDING OFFICER. Is there objection to temporarily laying aside the unfinished business? The Chair hears none, and it is so ordered. The Senator from Colorado will proceed.

Mr. WOLCOTT. Mr. President, until a day or two ago I had no idea of addressing the Senate on the matters pertaining to this treaty, which should, in my opinion, be properly considered only in executive session. It was not until it has become apparent that the manipulations and complications surrounding certain of the resolutions which have been introduced into this body were to serve solely as a cloak to an organized effort to bring about the defeat of the treaty that I felt impelled to say a few words respecting these resolutions.

Mr. President, in the months preceding the opening of hostilities the prospect of war with Spain had no charms for me, and now, in common with millions of the American people, I move with reluctant feet along the path which our national duty seems to point, not because I do not recognize the necessity of following it, but because it is new and untried.

If the commissioners appointed by the President of the United States had brought us a treaty by the terms of which we were to relinquish all the Spanish islands in the Pacific, I should have voted to ratify it. If they had brought here a treaty which reserved us a coaling station and gave up the rest of the islands, I should have joined in a vote to approve their action. In their wisdom they have agreed upon a treaty which retains all those islands, and I see before me but one duty, and that is to stand by my Government and by the action of these commissioners.

Who would have dreamed last June that within six months there would be presented in the Senate the spectacle which we have witnessed here for the last two or three weeks? Within two months after the declaration of hostilities the providence of God and the prowess of our soldiers and our sailors brought us overwhelming victory. Then came the protocol, and following that the President, within the limits of his constitutional duty, appointed commissioners to meet on neutral soil with commissioners from the Kingdom of Spain to negotiate a treaty.

The commissioners appointed by the President were all men eminent for character, attainments, and ability. We may judge something of them by the three members of this Chamber, representing both political parties, who were chosen to serve upon that commission. There is not a member of the Senate who would not trust those gentlemen with the most intricate and delicate matters pertaining to his own personal welfare or who does not recognize their eminent fitness for the negotiations with which they were intrusted.

Month after month those commissioners sat, but little of the story of their labors is told in the printed book before us, and they agreed finally with the commissioners of Spain and brought back here a treaty approved by the President and now laid upon our desks, by the terms of which we are of course left free to deal with the Philippines as we shall see fit hereafter, and by which we reserve the power to give them such legal status as Congress shall wisely determine.

And yet, Mr. President, we stand here wrangling day after day before the gaze of the whole world, seeking to belittle the action of these commissioners, and by resolutions in open Senate we seek to strip the treaty of much of its force and effect, and give such counsel and aid as we may to those people in the Philippines who might be inclined to question our authority.

There are, Mr. President, no questions raised by these resolutions or their amendments that could not be equally well and satisfactorily dealt with after the treaty shall have been ratified. And I notice that many of the Senators who a few months ago were so certain that the insurgents of Cuba possessed all the qualities necessary to self-government—had a congress and cabinets and the power to levy taxes and collect revenues and all the paraphernalia of a state—are to-day equally certain and equally sure that the inhabitants of the Philippines are likewise fitted for wise and intelligent self-government.

The Constitution of the United States empowers the President to make treaties, subject to the concurrence of a vote of two-thirds of the Senate. This provision was inserted because our fathers believed that, however much we might differ on questions of internal policy, however much in the affairs of our own country we might dispute and argue, when we came to face a foreign foe or our relations with other countries we would stand as a unit together, sinking and obliterating party and party lines.

For my own guidance, Mr. President, I recognize a vast difference in the moral obligation I owe my country when I come to deal in the Senate with a commercial treaty, when this country is at peace, and the attitude I owe our Government when I am called upon to pass on a treaty of peace solemnly negotiated for the purpose of closing actual hostilities with a nation with which we are at war.

Never in the history of our country was it so important as now that the Senate of the United States should present an unbroken front. We owe a debt to our kin across the sea that perhaps we may some day partially pay. When the war clouds lowered and the air was full of hate, our brothers in race, language, and destiny, in quiet English fashion, took their place beside us, elbow touching elbow, and back of us were the services of their trained diplomacy and their genuine and unqualified friendship; and had it not been for the moral support which Great Britain gave us during this conflict we would not have emerged from it without an international contest of larger or smaller dimensions.

Bar England, there is not a country in Europe that is not hostile to us. During all this war they stood in sullen hate, hoping for our defeat and that disaster might come to us; and to-day they wait with eager and rapacious gaze, hoping that some event may yet prevent our reaping the fruits of the treaty which has been agreed upon by the commissioners of the two countries. Yet, while this critical condition of affairs exists, it has become evident within the last few days that certain political leaders in this Chamber believe that a new issue should be brought before the American people to be determined at the next Presidential election. They intend that the American people shall be called to pass on the questions arising out of the war, and that this shall be the issue of the next campaign.

For one I believe that issue a fair one, and I am ready, as all good citizens ought to be, to meet the views of the whole American people upon the question of the conduct of the war, of its achievements, and of the policy this country should pursue at its close. But it is deplorable, Mr. President, that in formulating such an issue and in pursuit of such a policy those leaders should find it necessary to seek to dishonor this Government and the Administration which has guided us so wisely through the troubled sea of international complications and brought us to the threshold of an honorable peace; that they should seek to degrade us in the face of the nations of the world; and that they should attempt to bring about some fancied political advantage by an effort to defeat the ratification of a treaty which, if unratified, must bring back a condition of war as it existed before the report of the commissioners, passive it may be, Mr. President, but full of uncertainty and full of disaster to the interests and the welfare of our country.

For my part, I do not believe these tactics can win. There are on both sides of this Chamber enough men animated with high patriotism, ready to obliterate party lines and to stand shoulder to shoulder together and with the Government, not because it is a republican Government, but because it is an American Government, and they will agree to fight out hereafter the questions that may arise as to the conduct and disposal of the Philippines when the treaty shall have been ratified.

Mr. President, no matter what any man may say, this war was a war solely of humanity. It can not be too often reiterated that it had its inception in unselfishness and it finds its conclusion in equal unselfishness. The course of events, unexpected and necessarily unforeseen, leave us at the conclusion of this war charged with a duty toward 9,000,000 people in far-off, distant seas. We found them cruelly oppressed by Spain. No man with bowels of compassion would want to turn them back to that country. We know but little about them. We have reached only the very fringes of our knowledge of that country, its topography, its people, their character, and their possibilities. But it is believed by men at least as wise as we that there exists there a condition which if left to itself would result in internecine strife, perhaps extending over a generation, with its accompaniment of bloodshed and murder and rapine; and that the people there are as yet apparently unfitted for self-government.

More than this, they realize that if we to-day abandon those islands as a derelict upon the face of the waters we leave them open to the land-hunger and the greed of the countries of Europe that are now seeking to colonize land the wide world over, with the probability that our action would plunge the world in war.

Mr. President, for one I am not unwilling to face the responsibilities of this treaty with all that its terms imply. We shall not put our hands upon that people except to bless them. American institutions mean liberty and not despotism, and our dealings with those islanders, be they brief or be they for all time, can only serve to lift them up nearer into the light of civilization and of Christianity.

We have been told during this discussion that our occupancy of the Philippines would have a tendency to injure our own people and engender corruption among our own officers sent to govern them. Mr. President, such a statement is humiliating, and, I believe, untrue. In the large cities of this country municipal government is woefully bad, and it is bad solely because the people living in those cities are negligent and unwilling to bear their share in local administration. But outside those cities the civic virtues of the people of the United States are of the highest character. Our relations with those islands would be honorable and fair and just. We live in the light of publicity. We might make mistakes—we probably shall—but out of our government of those islands those people, by our example and under our control, will find themselves made more secure in their lives, their happiness, and the protection of their property.

Mr. President, it has also been frequently said in the progress of this discussion that our continued occupancy of those islands is contrary to the spirit of American institutions. Who shall say this? This Republic represents the first and only experiment in absolute self-government by the Anglo-Saxon race, intermingled and reenforced by the industrious of all the countries of the Old World. For more than a hundred years we have endured, and every decade has brought us increasing strength and prosperity, and, it may be, an increasing tendency to greater bitterness in our consideration of questions of internal policy. Who is to say that in the evolution of such a Republic as this the time has not come when the immense development of our internal resources and the marvelous growth of our domestic and foreign commerce and a realization of our virile strength have not stimulated that Anglo-Saxon restlessness which beats with the blood of the race into an activity which will not be quenched until we have finally planted our standard in that far-off archipelago which inevitable destiny has intrusted to our hands?

It may well be that this people have found, through the outlet which the results of the war with Spain compelled us to take, the one course which shall lead to the perpetuity of our institutions and the safety and stability of the Republic.

Time alone can determine and make clear the duty we owe ourselves and the people of the Philippines. To-day we face the question of rejecting or emasculating the conclusions solemnly reached by the commissioners of Spain and the United States or of standing loyally by our Government. For myself there is but one path; to my vision that way alone lies honor.

[Applause in the galleries.]

The PRESIDING OFFICER. The Chair will caution the occupants of the galleries that expressions of approbation or disapprobation are not allowed under the rules of the Senate.

Mr. ALLEN. Mr. President——

Mr. LODGE. I move that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

Mr. ALLEN. I hope the Senator will withdraw that motion.

Mr. LODGE. I beg the Senator's pardon. I did not see that he had risen, and I withhold the motion.

Mr. ALLEN. I was simply going to request the Senator to withdraw his motion for a time, but I am told on this side of the Chamber that his motion is according to the unanimous-consent agreement, and I suppose I shall have to submit to it.

EXECUTIVE SESSION.

Mr. LODGE. I renew my motion that the Senate proceed to the consideration of executive business.

The motion was agreed to; and the Senate proceeded to the consideration of executive business. After three hours spent in executive session the doors were reopened, and (at 5 o'clock and 15 minutes p. m.) the Senate adjourned until Monday, February 6, 1899, at 12 o'clock meridian.

HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

SATURDAY, February 4, 1899.

The House met at 12 o'clock m. Prayer by the Chaplain, Rev. HENRY N. COUDEN.

The Journal of yesterday's proceedings was read and approved.

DIGEST AND MANUAL.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I present a privileged report.

The Clerk read as follows:

Resolved, That there be printed 2,000 copies of the Digest and Manual of the Rules and Practice of the House of Representatives for the third session of the Fifty-fifth Congress, the same to be bound and distributed under the direction of the Speaker and Clerk of the House.

Mr. BAILEY. I should like to hear the last part of that resolution.

The resolution was again reported.

Mr. BAILEY. Well, is that the usual resolution?

Mr. PERKINS. That is the usual form, I will say to the gentleman from Texas.

Mr. BAILEY. Are these copies of the book not placed to the credit of members?

Mr. PERKINS. They are always distributed through the Clerk's office.

Mr. BAILEY. If that is the usual course——

Mr. RICHARDSON. I will state, Mr. Speaker, that that is the exact form in which this resolution has always been passed. These documents go to the Clerk's room, and they are distributed upon application of members.

Mr. BAILEY. My particular interest was from the fact that in my own State, and in many States of the Union, the legislatures are now in session, and there is an unusually large demand for the publication.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I wanted to say, Mr. Speaker, that I never did understand why this document was not distributed through the folding room the same as any other document, so that a member would get his pro rata; but it never has been done. It has always been the case that it went into the Clerk's office, and was distributed in that way.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman a question.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I would like to state, in response to what the gentleman has said as to the advisability of distributing these documents through the folding room instead of the Clerk's office, that one purpose to be served is to supply new members. New members, of course, members-elect to the next Congress, can not be reached through the folding room, and every new member is anxious at as early a date as possible to receive a copy of the Digest and Rules, and the Clerk, having them at his disposal, can supply them. That occurs to me as one reason why they should be distributed through the Clerk's office, as heretofore.

Mr. RICHARDSON. I think the reason suggested by my colleague is a very good one; but it does not insure that the new members would get them; because if any member desires to go there and get a dozen copies, he would get them, or probably two dozen copies. There is no limit upon what members may get when they go to the Clerk's office. If they went to the folding room, they would be distributed pro rata. I make no objection. This is the usual form, a form pursued for many years, and to change this resolution would fail to change the law, as this is a House resolution; and the distribution, if I am not mistaken, is in accordance with the act of January, 1895, known as the printing law, which simply followed existing law, and a law which had been on the statute book for many years. I think there is no question but that this, being a simple House resolution, would not change the existing law.

Mr. STEELE. I think, as a matter of fact, the Clerk does apportion these documents to members.

Mr. BAILEY. I think that is true, and I have had no trouble in connection with the distribution through the Clerk's office.

Mr. STEELE. Nor have I.

Mr. BAILEY. It just struck me as unusual.

Mr. RICHARDSON. It is unusual. It is not like any other document.

Mr. PERKINS. I think the gentleman from Kansas wanted to ask me a question.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman—there was some confusion, and I did not catch what rules these are that are proposed to be printed.

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman has a copy in his desk.

Mr. SIMPSON. The rules of the Fifty-fifth Congress?

Mr. PERKINS. The rules of the Fifty-fourth Congress.

Mr. SIMPSON. The rules of the Fifty-fourth Congress. Then you print the rules of the Fifty-fourth Congress for the Fifty-fifth Congress?

Mr. PERKINS. They have been extended to this Congress; they are the rules under which the House is now working.

Mr. SIMPSON. Then when are the new rules to be adopted?

Mr. DALZELL. At the next Congress.

Mr. SIMPSON. I would like to ask the gentleman from Iowa——

Mr. PERKINS. The gentleman understands that "the gentleman from Iowa" is not a member of the Committee on Rules, and his question is not pertinent.

Mr. SIMPSON. You might have heard the question first.

Mr. PERKINS. I heard it.

Mr. SIMPSON. The gentleman merely anticipated my question. It is now nearly the close of the last session of this Congress, and we were promised in the extra session that we were to have the rules for this Congress within thirty days.

Mr. PERKINS. Mr. Speaker, I am unwilling to go into a discussion of that matter.

Mr. SIMPSON. We have got those old rules in the book, and we are without new rules, and you are going to give that dose to the new members of the Fifty-sixth Congress.

Mr. PERKINS. I do not mean to yield further, and demand the previous question.

The resolution was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. PERKINS, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the resolution was agreed to was laid on the table.

SENATE JOINT RESOLUTION REFERRED.

Under clause 2 of Rule XXIV Senate joint resolution of the following title was taken from the Speaker's table and referred to its appropriate committee as indicated below:

S. R. 187. Joint resolution authorizing the Secretary of the Navy to have a monument erected in Havana, Cuba, to the memory of the sailors and marines who lost their lives by the explosion of the U. S. S. Maine and are there buried—to the Committee on the Library.

ADDITIONAL CLERKS TO COMMITTEE ON ENROLLED BILLS.

Mr. LOUD. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution 375.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the chairman of the Committee on Enrolled Bills be, and he hereby is, authorized to appoint two additional clerks to said committee for the remainder of the session, said appointments to date from January 20, 1899.

Mr. HULL. Why is the date of January 20 fixed?

Mr. LOUD. That is the date fixed by the Committee on Accounts.

Mr. HULL. Is that the date they were actually employed?

Mr. LOUD. It is.

Mr. BAILEY. The clerks have been employed since that date?

Mr. LOUD. They have, since the 20th of January.

Mr. MERCER. I would like to inquire if this is a report by the Committee on Accounts?

Mr. LOUD. It is; it was reported with a batch of other resolutions, and it is actually an important and necessary matter.

Mr. MERCER. The gentleman from California objected to some similar resolution the other day, but I will waive any objection I may have.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of the resolution? [After a pause.] The Chair hears none.

The resolution was agreed to.

OUTRAGES UPON AMERICAN CITIZENS IN CHINA.

Mr. BROMWELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of House resolution of inquiry concerning outrages on American citizens in China.

The Clerk read the resolution, as follows:

Resolved, That the Secretary of State be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to the House of Representatives of the United States, so far as the same may be done without detriment to public interests, all the information in his possession concerning certain alleged outrages committed upon the person of Bishop Earl Cranston and other American citizens in the city of Pekin, China, by the subjects of the Emperor of China, and what steps, if any, have been taken by the State Department in the matter of demanding suitable redress and indemnity therefor.

Mr. DOCKERY. Is this reported by any committee?

Mr. BROMWELL. It is exactly the same resolution that was reported by a committee and passed the two Houses in the form of a joint resolution. It is the one that we asked to withdraw yesterday. The President has this morning returned the joint resolution, and we now follow it with a simple House resolution.

The SPEAKER. In that connection the Chair will submit the following message from the President of the United States.

The Clerk read as follows:

To the House of Representatives:

In compliance with a resolution of the House of Representatives (the Senate concurring), I return herewith H. Res. No. 298, entitled "Joint resolution of inquiry concerning outrages on American citizens in China."

WILLIAM McKINLEY.

EXECUTIVE MANSION, February 4, 1899.

The joint resolution (H. Res. 298) is as follows:

That the President be, and he is hereby, requested to communicate to Congress, so far as the same may be done without detriment to public interests, all the information in his possession concerning certain alleged outrages committed upon the person of Bishop Earl Cranston and other American citizens in the city of Pekin, China, by subjects of the Emperor of China, and what steps, if any, have been taken by the State Department in the matter of demanding suitable redress and indemnity therefor.

The SPEAKER. Without objection, the joint resolution which has been returned by the President will lie on the table.

There was no objection.

The resolution offered by Mr. BROMWELL was then agreed to.

GRANTING CERTAIN LANDS TO CITY OF VICTOR, COLO.

Mr. BELL. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent for the present consideration of the bill (H. R. 11142) granting to the city of Victor, in the county of El Paso and State of Colorado, certain lands therein described, for water reservoirs.

The Clerk read the bill, as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the following-described tracts of land, situate in the county of El Paso and State of Colorado, namely: The NE. ¼ of the NE. ¼ of the SE. ¼ of section 3; the E. ½ of the SE. ¼ of the NE. ¼ of section 3; the NW. ¼ of the NW. ¼ of the SW. ¼ of section 2; the SW. ¼ of the NW. ¼ of section 2; the W. ½ of the SE. ¼ of the NW. ¼ of section 2; the NE. ¼ of the SE. ¼ of the NW. ¼ of section 2; the SE. ¼ of the NE. ¼ of the NW. ¼ of section 2; the NW. ¼ of the NE. ¼ of section 2, all in township 15 south, range 69 west of the Sixth principal meridian, and containing 160 acres of land, more or less, be and the same are hereby, granted and conveyed to the said city of Victor, in the county of El Paso and State of Colorado, to have and to hold said lands to its use and behoof forever for purposes of water storage and supply of its waterworks. And for said purposes said city shall forever have the right, in its discretion, to control and use any and all parts of the premises herein conveyed, in the construction of reservoirs, laying of such pipes and mains, and in making such improvements as may be necessary to utilize the waters contained in any natural or constructed reservoirs upon the said premises.

SEC. 2. That if the city of Victor shall at any time after the construction of reservoirs on the land described in section 1 of this act abandon the same, or cease to use the same for water storage, the land herein described shall revert to the Government of the United States of America. The survey of the lands so granted shall be made under the direction and approval of the War Department.

The amendments reported by the committee were as follows:

Strike out all after the word "two," in line 13, on page 1, and all of line 1 and down to and including the word "section," in line 2, on page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "southeast quarter lot 3, section 2, and lot 2 in section 2."

Strike out the word "sixty," in line 4, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof "fifty-seven and twenty-seven one-hundredths."

Strike out all of said bill beginning with and after the word "be," in line 5, page 2, and insert in lieu thereof the following: "may be entered by the mayor of said city, subject to the legal rights of others, if any, upon paying $1.25 per acre and the usual fees therefor, and a patent shall issue therefor as in other cases."

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the present consideration of this bill?

Mr. STEELE. I would like to ask the gentleman from Colorado [Mr. BELL] what is the value of the land in question and whether the Secretary of the Interior consents to this transfer?

Mr. BELL. He does. The land is about 11,000 feet above sea level, being a gorge of Beaver Creek, where the city of Victor, at an expense of about $18,000, has built a dam for the purpose of supplying the city with water. The water is now obtained from there for the city, but the people of the city are fearful that in the mining excitement in that region, although this particular tract is outside of the mining country, some one may come in and locate a claim there which will interfere with the dam and the water supply of the city.

The Department recommended the bill as originally introduced, providing that the city should have perpetual use of this body of land while used to accommodate this water supply. In that form the Department said there was no objection whatever to the measure. But the Committee on Public Lands has reported the bill in a form requiring the city to purchase the land, just as a person would be required to do and under similar circumstances, and we are willing to comply with this requirement and pay $1.25 per acre for the land and expenses of entry.

Mr. SHAFROTH. As a member of the Committee on Public Lands, I wish to say that the committee, after consideration, decided to enforce in this case the rule which has been uniformly enforced by the committee, that the reservoir or water right should be purchased outright from the Government. Now, the bill as reported provides that the city of Victor shall purchase this land at $1.25 an acre. I will state further that the reason that city could not take up this land under the general law is that the land is embraced in what was the Pikes Peak Military Reservation, a body of land about 10 miles square, and the general law does not allow land embraced in military reservations to be taken up in the ordinary way. There is, however, no objection to the bill as now presented, which has the unanimous approval of our committee.

Mr. LACEY. There should be a verbal amendment in the latter part of the bill. I have already suggested it to the gentleman from Colorado. It would simply correct a clerical error.

Mr. BELL. In accordance with the gentleman's suggestion, I offer the amendment which I send to the desk.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amend the amendment of the committee by inserting after the word "of," in line 2, page 3, the words "the city of Victor, El Paso County, Colo., for the use of said city."

The amendment to the amendment was agreed to.

The amendments as amended were adopted.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed and read a third time; and it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

Mr. BELL. I move to amend the title so as to read: "A bill granting to the mayor of the city of Victor, in the county of El Paso, State of Colorado, the right to enter certain lands."

The amendment was agreed to.

On motion of Mr. BELL, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

ORDER OF BUSINESS.

Mr. MARSH. I move that the House resolve itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union for the purpose of considering the bill (H. R. 11717) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900. Before that motion is put, I ask that general debate in Committee of the Whole be limited to ten minutes.

Mr. HAY. There is no objection to that request, I understand, on the part of the minority of the committee.

Mr. COX. This bill, with some immaterial amendments, has been unanimously reported by the committee, and I make no objection to the request of the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH]; but I hope that in the Committee of the Whole he will give the House a succinct statement of the provisions of the bill. That will be satisfactory to me, and, I think, to all the minority members of the committee.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent that if this bill should be completed by half past 2 o'clock the ceremonies connected with the reception of the statues of Benton and Blair from the State of Missouri shall begin at that time.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection to the request that general debate in Committee of the Whole be limited to ten minutes?

There was no objection.

The SPEAKER. The gentleman from Missouri asks that if this bill should be completed by half past 2 o'clock the services under the special order for to-day may then begin. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

MILITARY ACADEMY APPROPRIATION BILL.

The motion of Mr. MARSH was then agreed to; and the House accordingly resolved itself into Committee of the Whole on the state of the Union (Mr. HEPBURN in the chair) and proceeded to the consideration of the bill (H. R. 11717) making appropriations for the support of the Military Academy for the fiscal year ending June 30, 1900.

Mr. MARSH. I ask unanimous consent that the first reading of the bill be dispensed with.

There was no objection.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, this bill carries $301,817.01 for the expenses of the Military Academy for the next fiscal year. If gentlemen will refer to the report accompanying the bill they will find that this appropriation is larger than any appropriation made for the same purpose during the last four years.

It is about $122,000 larger than the bill which was passed in 1898. This increase is largely, and almost wholly, I may say, made up of three separate items; one, an item of $70,000 for a library building, for renovating the building by reconstructing the entire present building and converting it into a modernly equipped library building. This is necessary, and the appropriation was deemed to be a proper one by the committee. The other item is $25,000 for the purpose of furnishing the new memorial hall building.

This new memorial hall building has just been completed. It is the result of a gift from the late General McCollom, some fourteen or fifteen years ago, and cost about $250,000 for its construction. The Government has had possession of that sum of money—$250,000—for some twelve or fourteen years, and the building has just now been completed, but can not be occupied until provision is made for light and furnishing, which is proposed to be provided by the proposition in this bill. The committee think that the appropriation should unhesitatingly be made, especially as the building itself is in fact a gift to the Government. The amount of money given by General McCollom for this purpose was expended by the Government in the construction of the building.

Then there is another appropriation of between eight and nine thousand dollars for a refrigerator plant, for ice-making purposes in the cadets' mess hall. It will be noted that the estimates for this work are $100; but that estimate applies exclusively to the repair of this refrigerator. On a careful and full investigation of the facts by your committee they felt warranted in reporting to the House that it was better to tear out the old one, and put in a new machine that would embrace not only the refrigerator plant, but also the ice-making machinery as well. By means of this pure water can be furnished to the cadets.

These three items, Mr. Chairman, make up pretty much all the difference between the amount carried by the present bill and that appropriated in the bill for 1898; and as these various items are reached in the consideration of the bill by paragraphs, such information as the committee is able to give to the members will be cheerfully given if desired.

I ask for the reading of the bill.

Mr. COX. Will my friend yield to me for a moment?

Mr. MARSH. How much time have I remaining?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman has five minutes.

Mr. COX. I only want two minutes.

Mr. MARSH. I yield four minutes to my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. COX. I do not want that much time. I only wish to make a single remark.

In the examination of this bill as it went through the committee, I do not think that any more care could possibly have been bestowed on a bill of any kind and under any circumstances. Not that the bill is a very great one or involved any unusual study, but every item was carefully examined and thoroughly and fully considered by the members of the committee, and I feel prepared to say to the House, so far as my judgment is concerned, that we could not have done better than we did in the preparation and report of the bill to the House. I believe the House can rely upon the committee in this regard, and adopt the provisions of the bill without question.

There were of course criticisms of some items in the committee. That necessarily and always arises. And there was some consumption of time in the committee on various items.

I think I may say, as a member of the committee reporting the bill, that it is the best bill which has been reported, as far as my information goes. The minority of the committee, I am glad to say, attended every session and gave full and careful consideration to all of the items of the bill.

That is all I desired to say.

The Clerk read as follows:

For pay of one adjutant in addition to pay as second lieutenant, not mounted, $300.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word for the purpose of inquiring as to the necessity for this appropriation. It seems to be an entirely new item. I suppose, of course, there is some reason for it.

Mr. MARSH. I suppose the gentleman refers to this item of $600?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes; is that not an increase of salary?

Mr. MARSH. It is an increase of pay. And the committee think it a very proper increase.

Mr. DOCKERY. Well, I do not undertake to question the gentleman's judgment, but I would like to have some explanation of it.

Mr. MARSH. If the gentleman will turn to page 2 of the hearings before the committee, he will find that Colonel Mills testifies that the law fixes the pay of the adjutant of the Army as that of a captain, and last year the position was filled by a captain, so that at that time, of course, it made no difference, and there was no necessity for the appropriation. But this year the place is filled by a second lieutenant, and this increases the pay as provided by the law. He is performing the duty of a captain, in other words.

Mr. HULL. That is to say, it is not an increase in the pay, but makes the pay conform to the law?

Mr. MARSH. That is correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

or pay of the Military Academy band, field musicians, general army service, cavalry detachment, and enlisted men on detached service, and extra pay for enlisted men on special duty.

Mr. STEELE. There is a letter left out in the first line of that paragraph, and I move that it be inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. Without objection, the letter "F" will be inserted.

The Clerk read as follows:

Interest on retained pay due enlisted men, $300.

Mr. LLOYD. I should like to ask the chairman of the committee, for the information of myself and others, what is meant by that paragraph—interest on retained pay due enlisted men.

Mr. MARSH. The law provides that a soldier can allow his pay to remain in the hands of the Government, and he draws interest upon it under regulations and restrictions prescribed by law. This is the estimate to cover the amount that it is thought will be necessary.

Mr. LLOYD. To cover the interest to be paid on retained pay?

Mr. MARSH. Yes. It is merely an estimate to cover that, and ordinarily it is about correct.

The Clerk read as follows:

Traveling allowances to enlisted men on discharge, $300.

Mr. DOCKERY. This bill seems to be a substantial reproduction of existing law, but the item just read is a new one. I should be glad to have the gentleman in charge of the bill explain it.

Mr. MARSH. Traveling allowances to enlisted men on discharge?

Mr. DOCKERY. Yes. As I understand it, that seems to be a new item.

Mr. MARSH. I think that is a very old item. Soldiers who are discharged are always allowed traveling expenses home.

Mr. DOCKERY. The item may have appeared in bills prior to the current law, but the item is not in the current law.

Mr. MARSH. I will tell you why it may not be there, because there may have been no one to be discharged in the last fiscal year. This is an estimate to defray this expense on account of those soldiers who will be entitled to discharge next year.

Mr. DOCKERY. I thank the gentleman for the information.

Mr. COX. I should like to ask one question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee.

Mr. COX. Is the discussion here for the purpose of informing the gentleman from Missouri, my friend [Mr. DOCKERY], whether or not the committee understood what they were doing?

Mr. MARSH. I will say to my friend——

Mr. COX. Oh, do not answer it. Let it go.

Mr. MARSH. I think my friend from Missouri was perfectly right in asking the question, because that provision was not in the bill last year.

Mr. COX. But the gentleman from Missouri seems to supervise every bill that comes into this House.

Mr. DOCKERY. But not the gentleman from Tennessee. I should dislike to undertake that.

Mr. COX. You will not supervise me, and I do my duty on the committee as well as you do yours, and I know what this bill is. Of course, I do not object, but I have sat here for six years, and every time a bill comes in here from the committee the gentleman asks a great many questions about it. I think a gentleman as intelligent and honest as he is should stop his criticisms, when the minority of this committee have not made a single objection to this bill, except what they fought out of the bill, knocking down the appropriation nearly a hundred thousand dollars. I do not like this sort of indirect criticism, and I would not tolerate it from anybody but my friend from Missouri, who always knows everything.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman, I believe it is my province, and the duty of every member of the House, to seek information as best he can. Certainly it is the duty of the gentleman in charge of a bill to furnish it, and the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] in charge of the bill has very courteously responded to all requests for information.

Mr. COX. Just one word. There is no doubt about that. Every member of the committee will treat you the same way, but I do suggest to you that when you ask a question, as you did ask just a moment ago, do you presume that nobody on the committee understands it but yourself?

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will read.

The Clerk read as follows:

For extra pay of one enlisted man employed as watchman, at 35 cents per day, $175.57;

For extra pay of one enlisted man employed as trumpeter at the cadet barracks, at 35 cents per day, $127.75.

Mr. HAY. I desire to call the attention of the gentleman from Illinois to two items on page 6, one of which reads:

For extra pay of one enlisted man employed as watchman, at 35 cents per day, $175.57.

Right below it is another item which reads:

For extra pay of one enlisted man employed as trumpeter at the cadet barracks, at 35 cents per day, $127.75.

That ought to be $175.57, instead of $127.75. I therefore move to amend the bill in order to make the figures agree.

Mr. STEELE. In lines 21 and 22, it should be $127.25, instead of $175.

Mr. HAY. At 35 cents a day it ought to be one or the other.

Mr. STEELE. At 35 cents a day it would be $127.25, instead of $175. That gives him pay for every day in the year—three hundred and sixty-five days.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia has the floor.

Mr. HAY. I yield to the gentleman from Illinois.

Mr. MARSH. On line 21, page 6, if the committee will allow us to go back, I would suggest, in lines 21 and 22, that $175.57 be stricken out and $127.75 inserted.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

Lines 21 and 22, page 6, strike out "$175.57" and insert "$127.75."

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Taking out old drying room in cadet laundry, putting in new metal drying room with outer casing of heavy galvanized corrugated iron, inner frame of heavy galvanized channel, angle, and T-iron, securely bolted and fastened, inside packing to be of asbestos, with all the latest improvements in racks, panels, etc., complete in all respects, to be immediately available $1,150.

Mr. FOOTE. Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the committee in regard to this laundry. I see that they have for the laundry $2,740, and it is only a part of the laundry then; and here there are several propositions that these things shall be obtained without advertising. I would like to know about that. It is on page 20, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. MARSH. As far as the laundry is concerned, the evidence before the committee is that the present laundry is in very bad repair, and on the hearing before the committee, the committee were unanimously in favor of making these provisions on the ground of economy and on the ground of expedition. In the summer time these boys wear white clothes, and the amount of washing and laundry work there is very heavy.

Mr. FOOTE. I want to know particularly what they mean by "without advertising."

Mr. MARSH. That is not in this paragraph.

Mr. FOOTE. It is all through here, page 20, in line 21 and line 24.

Mr. MARSH. We have not got to line 21.

Mr. FOOTE. It is also in line 12, page 22.

Mr. MARSH. In line 12?

Mr. FOOTE. Line 12, on the next page.

Mr. MARSH. We have not reached that. When we come to it I will be glad to answer.

Mr. FOOTE. Would it not take less time to answer now?

Mr. MARSH. On what page? Line 21, you say.

For one tumbler for mangle, connected and in working order, to be immediately available and to be expended without advertising, $135.

That is a fixture of the machine.

Mr. FOOTE. I understand that exactly.

Mr. MARSH (continuing). And there is only one concern that can supply this repair. It is like a mowing machine. If you have a McCormick machine, nobody but McCormick can furnish the repair.

Mr. HULL. I will say that so far as these items are concerned the sums are so small that no harm can result.

Mr. HAY. It will cost about as much to advertise as it will to buy the repair.

Mr. FOOTE. That is what I wanted to know.

Mr. MARSH. These repairs can not be furnished by anybody but one concern that made this machine.

Mr. HULL. Now, on this item "for two 28-inch solid curb extractors, $340." It is the same with that. These are all for very small sums, where the advertising would be a very considerable expense.

Mr. MARSH. That is right.

The Clerk read as follows:

Buildings and grounds, Military Academy: Repairing roads and paths, including roads and bridges on reservation.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, in the printing of the bill, in lines 19 and 20, the amount appropriated was left out; and I move to insert, after the word "reservation," in line 20, the words "one thousand dollars."

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

On page 21, line 20, after the word "reservation," insert "$1,000."

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, I desire to ask the gentleman a question in regard to this matter.

Mr. MARSH. I will say to my colleague that the estimate is $2,000, but the minutes of our committee meeting show that $1,000 was appropriated. The $1,000 in the print has dropped out somehow.

Mr. COX. All right.

The amendment was agreed to.

The Clerk read as follows:

Continuing construction of breast-high wall in dangerous places.

Mr. DOCKERY. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. HAY. I notice the amount is not in the bill.

Mr. MARSH. In lines 21 and 22, for continuing construction of breast-high wall in dangerous places, immediately after "places," I move to insert the words "five hundred dollars." That was agreed upon by the committee, but does not appear in the bill.

The CHAIRMAN. The Clerk will report the amendment.

The Clerk read as follows:

After the word "places," in line 22, insert the words "five hundred dollars."

The amendment was agreed to.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I think the Board of Visitors was opposed to this appropriation. It is one that has been asked for a great many times. They have an operating room there that is way beyond the average operating room. They want an especially fine one, but I think, with the number of operations they have at West Point, what they have there is ample. I made special inquiries when I was on the Board of Visitors, and I think my friend from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP] was on the board the year before, and it is rather a rare thing for them to have an operation at all. If it is a broken leg or anything of that kind, they have an operating room that is ample.

If it is even an operation for appendicitis, which is about the only thing that can happen there outside of a broken leg, the operating room is ample, and I do not believe it is necessary to expend this money in fitting up an operating room simply for operating purposes. While I am in hearty sympathy with my committee on all things, I was not present at the hearing, and I would like to hear from my colleague, who was acting chairman of the committee, what were the actual facts at the hearing, and if there were any new facts developed for its necessity. This appropriation has been asked for for eight years, and invariably it has been stricken out by the committee.

Mr. MARSH. Mr. Chairman, this is an appropriation that pertains to the health of the inmates of that school, and the attendants and employees there. I will read the testimony at the hearing before the committee in favor of this amendment of this clause in the bill:

Mr. COX. What is that for?

Colonel MILLS. There is no operating room there now, and one is necessary.

Now, that was stated before the committee without any contradiction from anybody, and my colleague from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP] was present at the time.

Mr. BELKNAP. I think the gentleman is mistaken. I think he will find that I asked questions later on which developed the true situation.

Mr. MARSH. I will read on further:

Mr. HAY. How many operations per year do you have?

Colonel MILLS. The operations are few; but only the other day there was a cadet operated upon by the surgeons for hernia. You know that that is a critical operation; and while those cases will not occur often they are liable to occur at any time, and there should be a proper place for the treatment of such cases.

Mr. BELKNAP. You have what is called an operating room now?

Colonel MILLS. Yes, sir; but it is simply a large ward.

Mr. BELKNAP. I remember that in one corner of the hospital there was an operating table or couch.

Colonel MILLS. Yes, sir.

Mr. BELKNAP. Since we are going to have items here which are absolutely essential, from my personal investigation of that room I think you can get along with what you have.

Colonel MILLS. There is no proper operating room there now. There has been a change in the surgeons since you have been there.

Mr. GRIFFIN. We have said that same thing about this item before, and have been putting it off. There is this to be said: That the medical profession at large, in their private offices, have procured these modern instruments and appliances; and during all this time the Military Academy has been obliged to confine itself to old appliances, and it can not keep abreast of the medical profession generally.

Mr. HAY. This item does not specify what they are going to put up. Is it for surgical instruments?

Colonel MILLS. No, sir. They are all supplied; but it will be for fitting up an operating room with the most modern appliances, so that there will be no danger from contamination, and one that can be made free of any possible germs, with proper facilities at hand for the cleaning of instruments, etc.

Mr. HAY. You have the room now?

Colonel MILLS. Yes, sir; there is a room for the purpose, but a mighty poor and inconvenient one.

Mr. HAY. Who made this estimate?

Colonel MILLS. This is Dr. Bannister's estimate.

The CHAIRMAN. The country has been very much alive in the last few months to the treatment of the sick and wounded, and I believe that public sentiment will uphold this committee and Congress in providing at the Military Academy the finest equipment for the treatment of surgical cases, and therefore I think this item had better remain in the bill.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I think, as I thought before, that we ought not to be niggardly in the appropriation of sufficient money to supply first-class hospital services at West Point, where the young men from every Congressional district in this country are confined for four years. The parents at home intrust these sons, among the brightest young men of the district, to the hands of the military authorities at that school, and your committee thought that the very first-class hospital services should be provided for the school, where the very first-class hospital and medical attendance would be given; and it seems to our committee that after this investigation they ought to have a first-class operating room. There has been a great advance in recent years in surgery, and the prevention of germs, the cleaning of the room, the cleansing of instruments which this will provide for is an advance step in that direction.

Not only does it provide for the surgical operating room, but it provides an additional room adjacent to it in which the patient who has been operated upon may be placed so as not to bring him wounded, as he is, in contact with other patients in the hospital. I believe, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen, that this provision ought to remain in this bill.

Mr. FOOTE. I would like to ask the gentleman how many operations have been performed there the last year.

Mr. MARSH. That question was asked Colonel Mills. He said not many, but he said they had one only last week, an operation for hernia. Now, an operation to cure hernia is of recent practice, and is one of the most delicate operations known to surgery.

Mr. FOOTE. Do they have to have a particular room for it?

Mr. MARSH. No man knows when a young man from his district may have a broken leg or some other trouble that will make it necessary that an operation shall be performed upon him. I say that if there is any institution in the country, public or private, maintained by the public Treasury or by private corporation that ought to be first class, it is the institution at West Point, where we send from every Congressional district in this country for four years the picked young men of the nation.

Mr. HULL. Mr. Chairman, I heartily agree with all my colleague has said as to maintaining a splendid hospital at West Point, and I think we have it. The proposed appropriation here has nothing to do with the care of the health of the cadet, except the building of an additional operating room. I am sorry my colleague did not go to West Point last June. I wanted him to go, for he was chairman of the subcommittee that is in charge of the West Point Military Academy, and I believe if he had gone there he would not have been in favor of this appropriation. They have a good operating room there, better than the average operating room attached to the medical colleges out West.

It is now fitted up with tables, with electric lights, with water appliances, with antiseptic arrangements, with everything necessary to prevent the very evils of which my friend speaks. And there has never been a Board of Visitors to West Point, within my knowledge, that have not reported against this appropriation. When I visited the Academy, I asked specifically how many operations they had had, and the only one, I think, that they had had for three years was the setting of a broken leg, or something of that kind.

Now, that room is, in my judgment, ample for the needs of the institution. So far as the appliances are concerned, they are all modern. What the officers want there is a handsomer room, practically a new building. This entire appropriation, if you make it, will be expended, not in improved appliances, but in building a room adjoining the room they now have—in the rear of it—and fitting it up with tile floors. The present room has not such flooring; it has a hard-wood floor. But everything is scrupulously clean and admirably kept.

So far as concerns the supposed necessity of having a room in which persons subjected to surgical operations may be kept separate from the other cadets, they have such room now. Immediately after a man is operated on, he can be taken into one of the rooms and kept apart from the other cadets.

I am not criticising this appropriation. I know that the superintendent of the Academy has for years been in favor of it, because it will add to the beauty of the buildings on the grounds and will give a more elaborate operating room.

Mr. DOCKERY. Does the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] propose to strike out the appropriation?

Mr. MARSH. I think a remark dropped by my friend from Iowa is calculated to create a false impression. The gentleman said that this appropriation contemplates the erection of an additional building.

Mr. HULL. That is my recollection of what the officers stated to me when I was there.

Mr. MARSH. It does not.

Mr. HULL. It contemplates an additional room adjoining the present one.

Mr. MARSH. It does not contemplate the building of an additional room, but the fixing up of two rooms in the existing building.

Mr. HULL. I appeal to my friend from Illinois whether it is not contemplated to erect an additional room?

Mr. MARSH. No.

Mr. HULL. That is the way it was explained to me.

Mr. MARSH. That is not the way it was explained before the committee.

Mr. HULL. I suggest to my friend that, as he will be a member of the next Congress, he should be one of the Board of Visitors to West Point; and no harm can come from letting this matter go over now; and then if he should visit the institution and will state on his judgment that this appropriation is necessary, I shall be heartily in favor of it. But I think we should not make the appropriation until we have the judgment of some Board of Visitors that it is necessary. I think that without such recommendation the appropriation should be struck out; but I shall not submit that motion. I content myself with having called attention to the matter.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, I hope that this provision will not be stricken from the bill. I do not like to disagree with the chairman of our committee, but it does seem to me that in all matters of health these cadets and the soldiers stationed at this post should be carefully guarded. If there is anything that we know to be true, it is that in surgical operations it is of most essential importance that no disease germs should come near the patient operated on. The testimony on the hearings before the committee was that the room now used as an operating room is wholly incapable of meeting the health conditions of which the chairman has spoken.

This is merely and entirely a provision for the health of those students. I do not care how many operations there may be there during a year. If you have only one operation during that period, and by reason of the fact that a proper operating room is not provided, the operation should prove unsuccessful and the cadet should die for want of the provision now sought to be made, the failure of Congress to appropriate this pittance of $2,400 to protect the health of those boys could not be excused; when no longer ago than last Thursday you appropriated $29,000,000 for rivers and harbors and creeks—half of which, I venture to say, will never be of any use to the country at all. I hope, therefore, that this provision, which looks to the health of the cadets, will be kept in the bill.

I trust that my friend from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP], a member of the Board of Visitors, who was present in the committee room at the time this matter came up, will state to the House the fact that he thought this provision ought to be incorporated in the bill.

Mr. BELKNAP. Responding to the remarks of my friend from Virginia [Mr. HAY], my colleague on the committee, I beg to say that if he will refer to the printed reports of the hearings he will find that I stated to Colonel Mills—I quote from the report of the hearings—

> Since we are going to have items here which are absolutely essential, from my personal investigation of that room I think you can get along with what you have.

The committee voted for the appropriation. Personally I was opposed to it; but naturally, being outvoted, I submitted.

Mr. HAY. Was there a vote taken?

Mr. BELKNAP. I think not; the matter was passed without a formal vote. As a member of the Board of Visitors, I remember distinctly having made a close investigation in regard to this operating room in company with the surgeon in charge.

It has been well stated that this appropriation has been sought for many years by some of the officials at the West Point Academy. But when the gentleman asks me what I think of the matter, I conclude, from my best judgment and observation, that the establishment now provided for there is sufficient to meet all present wants. I am informed that it affords all of the facilities that may be necessary for West Point.

Now, Mr. Chairman, I want the needs of our splendid national Military Academy fully and wisely provided for. This bill is larger than usual, as has already been stated. We have made appropriations for certain purposes that we think are absolutely necessary; but I do not think, as far as I can see, that it would interfere at all with the health of the young men at the Academy or that there will be a lack of facilities for the performance of the necessary surgical operations at the Academy if this proposed appropriation is stricken out. I wish to make that remark without the slightest criticism, of course, on the gentlemen of the committee who have favored it. I speak only from my own judgment and observation. I was present when it was put into the bill, but the records show to the House that I expressed my opposition at the time, feeling that it was not necessary.

Mr. GAINES. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to ask the gentleman if he will yield to me for one or two questions?

Mr. BELKNAP. Certainly.

Mr. GAINES. I understand the gentleman to say that he went to West Point and made a personal investigation of this matter, and concluded that it was not necessary to make this appropriation?

Mr. BELKNAP. That is correct.

Mr. GAINES (continuing). And that the gentleman has been there repeatedly?

Mr. BELKNAP. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. Did you ever hear a complaint of the insufficiency of the accommodations for surgical operations?

Mr. BELKNAP. I have not.

Mr. GAINES. And you went to this particular room, with the surgeon in charge, as I understand you, and that room, in your judgment, is sufficient to meet the present wants of the hospital there?

Mr. BELKNAP. I think it is. The average sickness, of course, is about the same as in most other establishments where so many persons are congregated.

Mr. GAINES. About how large is the room?

Mr. BELKNAP. Thirty feet square, I should say.

Mr. HAY. If I am not mistaken, Colonel Mills said that it was large enough only for the operations to be performed, and that afterwards the patients had to be taken out into a separate room.

Mr. HULL. That is true of all operating rooms in hospitals. The patients are operated upon, but they are not kept in that room. They are removed elsewhere.

Mr. GAINES. From my own observation and experience in hospitals, I will state that the operating room is an entirely separate room from the surgical ward. The operation is performed in an operating room, and the patient is afterwards removed from that room to the other.

Mr. HAY. To the surgical ward.

Mr. GAINES. Yes; to the surgical ward. And this provision, as I understand it, is to be an entirely new room, fitted up with hard-wood floors, and all sorts of "banjo work" about it, and does not seem, as far as we are able now to ascertain, at all necessary. Has any other member of the committee been to West Point and examined the conditions there?

Mr. BELKNAP. The chairman of the committee was there.

Mr. GAINES. Did you visit the particular room?

Mr. MARSH. I said so.

A MEMBER. But the Board of Visitors, it seems, were opposed to the appropriations?

Mr. BELKNAP. Mr. Chairman, I wish to be perfectly frank with gentlemen present. I received the impression—and I do not think it is unreasonable—on the part of the surgeon that he wanted this additional room. But, as I have stated, I did not see the necessity for it at present.

Mr. GAINES. And in that I think the gentleman is right.

Mr. HAY. Before the gentleman from Illinois takes his seat, I would like to ask him one question.

Do you not think when an operation is performed or when the physicians are ready to perform it that they should have some sort of a place where they could operate with some degree of certainty?

Mr. GAINES. But they have a place for operating now.

Mr. HAY. But this appropriation is also to provide for necessary surgical instruments.

Mr. GAINES. Oh, the very best surgical operations in the world have been performed on the field of battle with very plain instruments.

Mr. BELKNAP. According to my observation, I think they have facilities now.

Mr. DOCKERY. The gentleman has been connected for a long time with the Military Committee, and four of the members visited the Military Academy. As I understand him, two of them who visited West Point do not think this appropriation is necessary, while the other two favor it?

Mr. BELKNAP. That is correct.

Mr. DOCKERY. Then the question is, whose judgment shall we take?

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman——

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. COX. Mr. Chairman, what is the proposition of the gentleman from Missouri?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York is now recognized.

Mr. COX. I understand that; but I want to know what proposition has been made by the gentleman from Missouri. There is not a man here who could hear or understand what he proposed.

Mr. QUIGG. I will guarantee to my friend from Tennessee that he shall hear what I have to say, if he will just allow me to proceed.

Mr. COX. I have no doubt of that. I am speaking now of what the gentleman from Missouri said. There is not a member on this side of the House who knows what it was.

The CHAIRMAN. The question is on the motion made by the gentleman from Iowa.

Mr. HULL. I made no motion. I only wanted to call the attention of my colleague to the fact that unless he is willing to have it go out I shall make no motion.

The CHAIRMAN. Then there is nothing before the House.

Mr. QUIGG. I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from New York.

Mr. QUIGG. Mr. Chairman, of course I am impressed, as other members of the House must be, by the statement of two gentlemen that they have examined this room. So have I, and I apprehend that my information of a medical and surgical character will compare with theirs.

Mr. BELKNAP. We agree to that.

Mr. QUIGG. I do not think that their testimony nor mine is the testimony on which the House ought to act, but that the testimony on which it ought to act is the testimony of the surgeon at West Point. He is presumed to know his business, and he may be safely presumed also to have at heart the good of the service. He wants an operating room that is just as good as any other operating room in a hospital, and surely that is what he is entitled to.

Now, accidents of a very severe character do occur at West Point. I do not think they are frequent. On the contrary, I believe them to be very rare; but the cavalry drill there invites a good many accidents, and they do occur, and on the very day when my attention happened to be directed to this room, and as a reason why it was directed, I saw a young man taken from the cavalry-practice room—I do not know what they call it, the stable, perhaps—into the operating room, there to have a very severe and serious operation performed. Now, I do not know whether this room is what it ought to be or not. I can not bear testimony to that; but I do bear testimony to the fact that the surgeon in charge says that the opening of a human body in that room is a serious danger.

Mr. HULL. It is in any room.

Mr. QUIGG. Yes, it is in any room.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman state why?

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman from Iowa says it is a serious danger in any room, but the surgeon there informs us that the health conditions of the room are not good. Now, I do not know anything about it, but that is the testimony of your surgeon in charge of the room, and surely his testimony is the best you can have. Now, a gentleman on the committee says that there is danger in any room. So there is; but surely, gentlemen, it is our business to reduce the danger to a minimum. I am very glad that the committee have recommended this item.

Mr. CLARDY. I should like to ask the gentleman how this room is finished?

Mr. QUIGG. It is a hard-wood finish.

Mr. CLARDY. All of it?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes.

Mr. CLARDY. Then how can it be dangerous?

Mr. QUIGG. Why, it ought to be a tile finish.

Mr. CLARDY. That might be some better. But I should like to know how many capital operations are usually performed at West Point during a year.

Mr. QUIGG. I have no idea.

Mr. CLARDY. Is there one, on an average?

Mr. QUIGG. If there is one during a century, we ought to provide for the safety of that one.

Mr. CLARDY. That is true, but the gentleman has already stated that that room is finished in hard wood, and consequently it ought to be reasonably safe.

Mr. GAINES. Will the gentleman yield to me?

Mr. QUIGG. I will in a minute. It ought to be as nearly absolutely safe as we can make it. The gentleman can not dispute that.

Mr. CLARDY. I am trying to ascertain what is the real condition of affairs up there.

Mr. GAINES. Now will the gentleman from New York allow me?

Mr. QUIGG. Yes.

Mr. GAINES. A few days ago I was in the city of New York to advise with a very distinguished physician about a member of my family who is sick. He is probably the most distinguished physician in New York. I went into his office, and his apartments were all hard wood. There was not a bit of tiling about it, and none of this gingerbread work you are talking about.

Mr. QUIGG. The gentleman, with the information which he offers us about doctors and things, ought to know that they do not operate in their offices, and they very rarely operate in any private room, and never do when they can avoid it. They operate in a room that is prepared for that purpose.

Mr. GAINES. Well, I was through several of his rooms. He showed me through his apartments, and there was no such thing as tiling, but all hard wood.

Mr. QUIGG. I withdraw my pro forma amendment.

Mr. GAINES. I want to be heard for a moment. There are two members of this committee who have visited this room, and they say it is sufficient. One of them states that it is about 30 feet square.

Mr. QUIGG. Oh, no; it is not.

Mr. GAINES. I will state that this is the largest operating room I ever saw, and I have seen a great many. I have had some experience, not as a surgeon, but as an observer of surgery and operations. I asked one of these gentlemen who was there with one of the surgeons about this particular room, and he says the room is large enough; that he heard no complaint in reference to the size, that it was sufficiently equipped, and that therefore he opposes this measure. They say that the sanitary conditions are not good, but the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP] says he heard of no unusual amount of illness there.

Mr. COX. Will my colleague yield to me for one moment?

Mr. GAINES. Yes.

Mr. COX. I want to know who that man was.

Mr. GAINES. The gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP] was there, the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] was there, and they were all opposed to this.

Mr. COX. Pardon me one moment——

Mr. GAINES. Now, Mr. Chairman, I would like to yield to my colleague, but——

Mr. COX. I hope my colleague will not object to my asking him this question.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Tennessee declines to yield.

Mr. GAINES. I withdraw the objection.

Mr. COX. I want to know what member of the committee—the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP] or any other gentleman—has been there and stated to him that the operating room is sufficient. I want to know of my colleague the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. BELKNAP] if he ever said anything of that sort?

Mr. BELKNAP rose.

Mr. GAINES. I move to strike out the last word.

Mr. COX. You will have to move to strike out about fourteen of these words.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman's time has expired.

Mr. COX. I hope my colleague will let us get down to the point.

The CHAIRMAN. The committee will be in order.

Mr. GAINES. I hope that my colleague will see the point when we do get to it. I do not want to be interrupted, and I hope that I may be indulged uninterruptedly for one moment or so to state this. It is said that its hygienic conditions are not good. That does not mean that that tiling must be put down, that a piano must be brought in, and all this banjo work that New York or Philadelphia or even Nashville surgeons might want. If we want to yield to the wants of these experts throughout this country, all the demands they make on the Treasury of the United States to equip all these quarters with all that sort of unnecessary paraphernalia, we would have a larger deficit in the public Treasury than we now have. I say that it is not necessary; but I shall not discuss this point further.

I ask the House to hear me for a moment on another matter that pertains to almost the same thing. There is no place to-day in Washington where a poor soldier of the Cuban war who is honorably discharged can lay his head in rest. There is not a place here to treat one single soldier. I have been keeping, out of my pocket, for nearly a week an honorably discharged victim of that war, who was rendered a cripple for life in the line of duty. He lay for three weeks unattended, and there was not a single, solitary person to help him except a private soldier, who got cold water and poured it on his dislocated hip and battered head.

Mr. GREENE of Nebraska. Do you mean a Cuban soldier?

Mr. GAINES. I mean a soldier that left the city of Montgomery, Ala., several months ago. As soon as the call of his country was made, he laid down his sledge hammer, joined the Fifth Immune Regiment of Alabama, and went on board ship bound for Santiago, and when in line of duty he fell 18 feet down a defective hatchway and dislocated his leg, and remained senseless for twenty-four or forty-eight hours and was taken then to a regimental hospital after they landed and allowed to remain there for fifteen days without any surgical attention, and is to-day by reason of that accident and that neglect a cripple for life.

Mr. QUIGG. I want to say——

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. GAINES. I hope that I may be given five minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. GAINES. Does not the gentleman yield for such information as this?

Mr. MARSH. I want to submit——

Mr. GAINES. I want a few minutes more, Mr. Chairman.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois is recognized.

Mr. GAINES. Does the gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MARSH] refuse to yield to me?

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. GAINES. Do you refuse to allow me to continue?

Mr. MARSH. I have no control of your time.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman——

Mr. MARSH. The Chair has stated your time has expired.

Mr. RIDGELY. I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman have five minutes more.

Mr. GAINES. I ask unanimous consent to continue my remarks for five minutes.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Illinois has the floor.

Mr. MARSH. I want to submit from the Book of Estimates on this subject:

It is proposed to convert one of the rooms in the hospital into an operating room and in its construction to make it conform to all the requirements of modern surgical technology in the treatment of diseases and injuries, as there is not now in this hospital a place suitable for the performance of surgical work under strict aseptic and antiseptic conditions and in accordance with the high standard of excellence which surgeons now strive to attain in the repair of injuries and operation wounds.

Now, in addition to that, there appeared in the hearings before the committee the following:

This operating room—

And I call the attention of the gentleman from Iowa [Mr. HULL] to this, who thinks it is proposed to build a new addition—

This operating room is very necessary, and this appropriation is necessary to secure for this hospital a proper place for performing operations in accordance with the teachings of modern surgical science. Whereas operations on cadets are not of daily or very frequent occurrence, yet important operations are required here. There should be a proper place for their performance.

This is a statement of the surgeon there in charge.

To-day—

He says—

I have had to perform a very important operation on a cadet, namely, the Bassini operation for the radical cure of inguinal hernia. The room that we are now required to use is far too large, having been constructed originally for a squad room for enlisted men of the Hospital Corps. It is proposed to convert a room of just the proper size in the third story into an operating room, and to return the men of the Hospital Corps to the present operating room, as originally intended for their squad room, and to use the room adjoining the proposed operating room, at present occupied by them, for a surgical ward. Surgical patients after operation should be kept separate from the general wards.

That is all I care to submit, Mr. Chairman.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word. When my time expired I was about to state that this soldier was taken to a regimental hospital, and there he was unattended for three weeks; not a single physician came near him, and finally, when General Wood was making his fortunate military pilgrimages around to see whether these lazy whelps had omitted to do their duty, he found this unfortunate soldier in this condition, and immediately ordered his discharge, and he bears with him to-day an honorable discharge. He is in Washington without money, without friends save such as he has made since he came here. I never saw to know him before he came to me for advice and assistance, although his home is in Nashville, Tenn.

He went in company with me to see the Pension Commissioner and applied for a pension. The Commissioner kindly aided us all he could. Mr. Evans gave him a ticket to what is known as the "Freeman's Home," down here on Missouri avenue, and there he was turned out into the snow and into the rain and the wind, without any protection whatever, with these honorable discharge papers in his pocket, forsooth, because they had made a rule that no pensioner, no soldier, no matter how honorably discharged nor where he came from, should have an abiding place there unless he fought in the late civil war, a war which occurred thirty years ago.

Mr. Chairman, such a rule, as here applied at least, was harsh, shocking, and repulsive, and I do say that it is time for us to stop trying to appease the ambitions of some New York physician, or some Philadelphia physician, or some Washington physician, or any physician wherever he may come from, that they may more scientifically treat West Point students who are going to, who may be, some future day, patriots, and go into our Treasury and take care of the men who have already shown themselves to be patriotic, and who bear the wounds and scars of conflict, and who carry in their pockets honorable discharges, as this poor lame, limb-broken, head-crushed, crutch-ridden soldier does to-day.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman yield for a question?

Mr. GAINES. With pleasure.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman furnish and have inserted in the RECORD the name of this soldier, his company and regiment, and the hospital in which he was a patient?

Mr. GAINES. I have his affidavit relating it all in detail, but not with me, and I am satisfied that the gentleman will have as heavy a heart about it, yes, I am satisfied, if possible, he will have a heavier heart about it than I have when he learns the facts in this case, and learns that this poor fellow was turned out in the snow and the rain without a place to lay his head, by an institution kept up by Congressional appropriations.

Mr. GRIFFIN. Will the gentleman furnish us with the name of the surgeon?

Mr. GAINES. I am going to furnish the whole thing. I am just beginning, and I intend to go to the bottom of it, if my life is spared.

Mr. GRIFFIN. I will say that if he will furnish the information we will aid him in his search.

Mr. GAINES. Michael J. McGuire is this soldier's name; and he will be at my office to-morrow, 1338 H street NW. He has been hobbling around the corridors of this House on crutches for three or four days in the agony of hell, with his splendid frame giving way from the disease that has been brought about by his misfortunes and by the outrageous military carpentership of these makeshift physicians at Santiago.

Mr. STEELE. How long does the gentleman from Tennessee say he has had charge of this man?

Mr. GAINES. Ever since Monday morning.

Mr. STEELE. And he has not gone to the War Department to report that inhuman surgeon?

Mr. GAINES. What would have been the use? That is not the point just now.

Mr. STEELE. Charges would have been preferred against the surgeon and he would have been dishonorably dismissed from the service, as he ought to be.

Mr. GAINES. I am trying now to keep the poor fellow from freezing to death in a land of plenty, with an overflowing Treasury with a Government failing to take care of him; but instead, he was turned out on the frozen pavements, into the storm, the wind, and the rain, a few days ago, like, Mr. Chairman, he was a traitor and not worthy of the recognition that it seems to me any man in this country would have given him, regardless of where he came from or where he fought. He has got a splendid record. He was a splendid blacksmith, and he left his home and friends to fight for the independence of Cuba, and is now totally dependent.

[Here the hammer fell.]

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I sympathize with the gentleman from Tennessee in the matter of the trouble he has had in regard to this discharged soldier, but I think, as such an appeal is likely to go to the public ear, one or two facts ought to be given which will somewhat change the situation as the gentleman from Tennessee has left it.

Mr. GAINES. I want to say that the gentleman from Ohio has done everything he could to help me in this matter. He has never failed to listen to the appeals of charity when I have appealed to him, and I thank him for it in behalf of this man.

Mr. GROSVENOR. I did not get up here, Mr. Chairman, to get an encomium from my friend from Tennessee.

Mr. GAINES. You are entitled to it.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Well, I will take one-tenth of what he says to be true. There is one fact I was trying to state, if I understand it correctly, which puts a modifying aspect upon this transaction, bad as it is.

This soldier, Mr. Chairman, fell into the same mistake that has been made by so many others of thinking that he can come to Washington and present himself with his wounds, as the gentleman from Tennessee describes, and get action of the Pension Department promptly—you might say instantly—on his claim.

Now, when the gentleman from Tennessee had asked my cooperation in this respect, I went at once to the telephone and got the Commissioner of Pensions at the other end of the line, and I discovered, on inquiry, after a few moments, that this soldier doubtless was hurt in the service of the Government—that is his own allegation, and I assume it to be true. But he had been discharged from the Army, so that he was no longer a soldier, but simply a citizen of the State of Tennessee.

He selected somebody who for him was to present his claim to the Pension Department——

Mr. GAINES. No; if the gentleman will permit me, he came in person and made his own application. Somebody gave him a railroad pass: an act of charity. I never saw him before, and really know nothing whatever of him, excepting what I have seen in the last few days. I know nothing and care nothing of his politics.

Mr. GROSVENOR. Somebody gave him a pass, I was just about to say. So much the better for the gentleman from Tennessee. It was, however, a mistaken kindness to give him a pass. It has been done in hundreds of cases, and the same result followed. He came here on the pass so furnished to him and made his application, as has been explained by the gentleman from Tennessee.

At the request of the gentleman from Tennessee [Mr. GAINES], I asked the Commissioner of Pensions if he could act instantly on a claim of that character. He told me that he could if certain things were complied with, to wit, first, that the soldier must have his record as a soldier and his regimental history. It is true that he held an honorable discharge, but that is not sufficient, as you all know. Then he said he ought to have evidence as to how the injury occurred. It is true the applicant in this case said that he was injured in the line of duty. But he did not show the incurrence of the injury, how it was acquired or in what manner.

Mr. GAINES. If my friend will permit me, he is entirely mistaken. His discharge is an honorable one, and shows that the injury was received while in the line of his duty.

Mr. GROSVENOR. That is true; but the details are not given. The gentleman knows that the matter is one of inquiry on the part of the Department.

And so, Mr. Chairman, in view of all the facts, the Pension Department found itself entirely incapacitated to give the pension without having these records before it; and we all know how important it is that they shall be presented to secure action.

Now, this boarding house to which the gentleman has referred is owned by the Grand Army of the Republic.

Mr. GAINES. And the Government of the United States keeps it up.

Mr. GROSVENOR. The Government of the United States certainly makes contributions to it. I do not controvert that statement. But if that organization knowingly turned a soldier out of the hospital under the circumstances detailed by the gentleman, then the organization, not the Government, is censurable for lack of humanity and Christian charity.

Now, another step in corroboration, in part, of what the gentleman from Tennessee has said. I think it astonishing, as a matter of fact, that in this city—a great city, the capital of the country—there is not some place where a man, under such circumstances, could go and obtain relief. But it seems that we have no such place. I suppose somebody is afraid, if we contribute for such purposes, if we give a few dollars to such a charity, that some church will reap the reputation and benefit of it. And if the statement of the gentleman from Tennessee is true, here we are preaching the doctrine of the Good Samaritan every Sunday, but giving no dollars to carry on the work, because we are afraid that somebody who does not belong to our church will get the benefit of the dollars that we bestow in charity!

Mr. GAINES. Now, a single word, Mr. Chairman. Will my friend from Ohio help me to get a resolution passed to provide for the honorable protection of the Spanish war soldiers and to give them the same privileges that the ex-Federal soldiers are getting under the administration of the Grand Army?

Mr. GROSVENOR. Mr. Chairman, I will not go—and it is not necessary that I should go—into details or limitations. I will do anything a man can do, anything in my power, for any discharged soldier, even a rebel soldier, and I use the term in no disparagement and in no partisan sense, for "the arms of love that compass me" will all suffering soldiers embrace. [Applause.]

The Clerk read as follows:

Continuing the construction and repair of the roads between the old south guardhouse and the southern boundary line of reservation, and for continuing the laying of a stone walk along same, $1,000.

Mr. GAINES. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

I ask unanimous consent to place in the RECORD, as has been well suggested by my friend from Maryland, the affidavit of the party to whom I have referred, so that everybody may see exactly the details and the facts in connection with the matter.

The CHAIRMAN. Is there objection to the request of the gentleman from Tennessee?

There was no objection.

The matter referred to by Mr. GAINES is as follows:

Deposition of Mike J. McGuire.

DISTRICT OF COLUMBIA,
United States of America, ss:

In the matter of the claim for pension of Mike J. McGuire.

Mike J. McGuire, being first duly sworn according to law, makes oath to the following statements:

1. My name is Mike J. McGuire; I am 33 years of age, and was born in Nashville, Tenn., my home.

2. I enlisted on the 2d day of July, 1898, in Company D, Fifth United States Volunteer Infantry, immunes, at Camp Walthall, Columbus, Miss. I was working at that place, in the shops of the Yazoo and Mississippi Valley Railroad, as a blacksmith, having gone there from Nashville, Tenn.

3. Upon the call for volunteers, I enlisted in the above regiment. Col. H. H. Sargent was the commanding officer. I left Camp Walthall with my regiment about the 3d day of August, 1898, and sailed from Savannah, Ga., for Santiago de Cuba, on the Rio Grande. Shortly before reaching Santiago de Cuba, and while on guard and in the line of duty, I fell through a hatchway a distance of 17 or 18 feet. This occurred between 7 and 8 o'clock in the evening, and it was quite dark at the time, and the place was dimly lighted. The door of the hatchway was broken off and completely gone.

I was unconscious from the fall until next morning. There was a long cut in the back of my head, and the head of the left femur was dislocated. My military record, as shown on the back of my discharge, reads: "Battles, engagements, skirmishes, expeditions (in print). Sick in hospital since August 10, 1898 (in writing). Wounds received in service (in print): None (in writing). Remarks (in print): Discharged on surgeon's certificate of disability. Dislocation of head of left femur. Occurred in line of duty. Record since enlistment has been excellent. Byron Dozier, first lieutenant, Fifth United States Volunteer Infantry, commanding Company D (in writing)."

4. Nothing was done for injuries for two days by the surgeons on board except to put cold water on my hip, and the blood was not even washed off my head. On the second evening after the accident I was taken ashore at Santiago de Cuba and placed in the regimental hospital, where I remained about three weeks. During all this time I received no treatment except cold water applied to my injured hip, and the rubbing of the hip with wet cloths caused blisters, which became very sore.

5. Shortly before I was taken away—that is, three weeks after accident—from the regimental hospital I was examined by Surgeon-Major Woodson and Drs. Pollard, Beard, and Anderson, regimental physicians, who stated that I was suffering from dislocation of the head of the left femur, and then they proposed to operate on me. They kept me two days without breakfast or supper preparing for the operation, but failed to perform any operation, without giving any reasons therefor. They did not even try to pull my limb into place. Just before the examination by the surgeons the soldiers had washed the blood from the wounds in my head. In the examination made by the surgeons they simply stood me on my feet, felt the place of injury, and measured both of my legs, finding the left leg 2¼ inches shorter than the right one.

I was then sent to the Spanish hospital in Cuba, and was there examined by surgeons, Majors Robertson, Quinten, and Carr, and Surgeon McHenry of the United States Army. These surgeons, with others, examined me about four times, standing me on my feet and measuring my legs, but never trying to pull the injured one into place—in fact, did nothing for me, except the cold-water applications, and even refused to give me any liniment to rub my leg with when I requested it. I remained at the Spanish hospital until the 5th day of November, 1898, having had to wait a week after my discharge for the transport ship, and during all the time I remained in the Spanish hospital I never received any treatment for my injuries, but was given a little quinine to prevent fever.

6. I made repeated requests of Major-Surgeon Robertson and Major-Surgeon Carr for my discharge, but no attention was paid to them until General Wood, about three weeks before my discharge, made an inspection of the hospital, when he inquired into my case. Upon learning the facts he reprimanded the surgeons and declared that I had been shamefully neglected and that I ought to sue the surgeons for $20,000 damages, and ordered my immediate discharge.

7. After my discharge I went to New York on the transport Berlin, a pair of crutches having been given to me at this hospital just before I left Santiago de Cuba. General Wood sent Sergeant Hennigan, of my company, to New York with me, where he left me. I was given free transportation to New York, but had to pay my fare from New York to Nashville, Tenn., and, in the condition I was at the time, it was necessary for me to take a sleeping car, which I was unable to leave, even for my meals, until I arrived at Nashville.

8. Upon my arrival at Nashville I went to see two distinguished surgeons—Dr. Briggs and Dr. Brower, of that place. After these physicians had examined me a number of times, they finally declared they could do nothing for me, for the reason that "the case had been neglected too long." They advised me to come to Washington for treatment.

9. I came on to Washington Sunday, a week since, and tried to get into the Marine Hospital, without success, but finally was taken into the Providence Hospital on Sunday morning, January 22, and remained until Thursday, January 26. On Wednesday, January 25, I was examined by Dr. Louis A. Walker and three other doctors, who declared they could not do anything for me; that I would be a cripple for life; that the injury was originally only an ordinary joint dislocation, but the case had been neglected so long that nothing could be done for me, as an operation would very likely result in losing my life.

10. Upon leaving the hospital I was without means, and called upon Mr. GAINES, Congressman from Nashville, Tenn., who went with me to the Pension Office and made out my pension claim, which is now on file there. Commissioner Evans ordered a ticket to be given me for admission to the Freeman's Hospital, on Missouri avenue, in the city of Washington, to remain there until my pension case is passed upon. Upon calling at the Freeman's Hospital I presented my ticket. The superintendent informed me that that hospital was exclusively for the use of ex-Federal soldiers who fought in the late civil war, and I was refused admission, although rain and snow were falling fast and weather cold.

11. I am without any means except such as I receive through the kindness of friends. I have inquired diligently, and so has Mr. GAINES, of the various hospitals in Washington and find that I have no right of admission to any of them, there being, it seems, no provision made for hospital care of soldiers who served in the war with Spain.

12. My left leg is now, according to Dr. Walker's measurements, 3 inches shorter than the right one, and the left thigh is getting smaller. I can not bear my weight on my left leg at all and can not walk at all without crutches. Before enlisting in the Army I was strong and in the best of health.

Interlineations made before signing and oath.

February 3, 1899.

MIKE J. McGUIRE.

Subscribed and sworn to this 4th day of February, 1899.

[SEAL.] C. C. STOUFFER, Notary Public.

The Clerk resumed and concluded the reading of the bill.

Mr. HAY. Mr. Chairman, as there was but a short time consumed in general debate on this bill, I ask unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] be allowed to speak until half past 2 o'clock, the hour fixed, I believe, for the ceremonies in connection with receiving the statues from the State of Missouri.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Virginia [Mr. HAY] asks unanimous consent that the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. GRIGGS] be permitted to address the Committee of the Whole until half past 2 o'clock. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

Mr. GRIGGS. Mr. Chairman, I thank the chairman of the committee [Mr. HAY] for his request that I be allowed to address the committee at this time, and the committee itself for its courteous consent. In Atlanta, Ga., on December 14, President McKinley said:

> In the evolution of sentiment and feeling, under the providence of God, in the spirit of fraternity, we should share with you in the care for the Confederate dead.

Mr. Chairman, I have never been disloyal to this Union in act or thought. I come from a State the large majority of whose citizens have never known or felt hostility to the flag which floats from the Dome of this Capitol. This being true, I hope I may be permitted to offer a few remarks on recent happenings without fear of misconstruction. If it shall be necessary to call your attention to a few facts in our country's history which are familiar to us all, and which may be called by some ancient rather than recent occurrences, my excuse is the apparent necessity for the same.

The conclusion of the great internecine struggle known as the "war between the States" was made notable by a campaign in the extreme South, closing with what is known in history as a "march through Georgia, from Atlanta to the sea." In its trail was desolation. Ashes and smoke and blackened ruins marked the terrible course of that fearful march through the heart of one of the fairest and richest regions of earth.

But that was war, and it is superfluous for me to add that "war is hell." Appomattox followed fast, the end came, and henceforth the Confederacy was but a memory.

Thirty-five years have rolled by in their ceaseless round since Sherman's "march to the sea." A generation has come upon the stage of action and been gathered to their fathers since the great soldier-President wrote, "Let us have peace." From that day to this good hour reconciliation has followed reconciliation, until it would seem that "one doth tread upon another's heels, so fast they follow."

Twenty-five years ago, nine years after the close of hostilities, the Democratic party, dominated by Southern men (Confederate brigadiers, if you please), was given control of this House. Dire were the forebodings, but vain were the prophecies of evil. The Union lived.

Two years later Rutherford B. Hayes, seated by a declared majority of 1 in the electoral college, 15 of his votes coming from the ex-Confederate States of South Carolina, Louisiana, and Florida, invited an ex-Confederate to a seat in his Cabinet. This same ex-Confederate went from the office of Postmaster-General to a seat on the bench of the courts of the United States, and retired full of years and honors earned in his country's service. Soldiers hitherto alleged to be necessary to restrain lawlessness in the South were withdrawn. All the States of the Union were once more recognized as equal, and harmony prevailed.

A few years later, when Chester A. Arthur, in his annual message to Congress, wisely forgot to treat of the Southern States as provinces and of the Southern people as separate and apart from their fellow-citizens of the Union, loud was the applause, great was the acclaim. Forgiveness had been followed by forgetfulness. There was to be henceforth one flag and one country, and from Maine to Texas "Peace on earth, good will to men" animated every heart.

In 1884 the Democratic party, still dominated by Southern men and controlled by Southern influences, for the first time in thirty-two years, carried the country and captured the Presidency. Grover Cleveland's appointments of ex-Confederates and Southern men to the highest and most responsible offices in the land is recent history, and I shall not weary your patience with a recital of their loyal services to the country.

Well do I remember, Mr. Speaker, a day in the autumn of 1887 when I found myself one of an immense throng gathered in Georgia's capital city to welcome him whose election was claimed to have reconciled and reunited a long-divided country. And when he proposed to return the captured Confederate battle flags, reconciliation, with a few individual and irreconcilable exceptions, was thought complete.

In 1896, when I came into this House, I found ex-Confederates comfortably seated on the Republican side, and, indeed, the only Confederate brigadier in the House, acting under the appointment of a Republican Speaker, was prosecuting election cases for the Republican party and passing on the election and qualifications of Representatives on this floor.

I need not say that I refer to the distinguished gentleman and brave soldier from Virginia, General WALKER. More than this, Mr. Speaker, I found seated over there a brilliant son of a Confederate father, actually representing a Grand Army constituency in this House—I refer to the gentleman from Minnesota [Mr. MORRIS]—while on this side I saw soldiers and sons of soldiers in the Army of the Union, working, voting, and fraternizing with alleged fire eaters from Arkansas, Mississippi, Carolina, Alabama, and Georgia. I look through this directory and I find that a majority of the members here were too young in 1861 to know the cause or comprehend the results of the civil war. Knowing all this, Mr. Speaker, and I have barely touched the subject, I thought I was justified in believing that the sections had been harmonized long before I came upon the stage of action here. I hear it declared, however, almost every day, that I was mistaken; that another war, with all its attendant sacrifices of blood and treasure, has been necessary to completely harmonize the North and South; that another "march through Georgia, from Atlanta to the sea," was necessary to completely blot out sectional bitterness and hate.

Unlike its predecessor and precursor, this second march to the sea, I am proud to say, left no trail of blackened ruins. Almost as spectacular, but without the fireworks, it was attended with great enthusiasm on all sides. Indeed, I am told that the second "march through Georgia" was but a succession of "nods and becks and wreathed smiles" and speeches of "linked sweetness long drawn out" at every stopping place from Atlanta to Savannah.

The great heart of the South did not pulsate in unison with the recent demand for war that came from some sections of the Union. Indeed, our people opposed the war with Spain. They could see but disaster to themselves and no good from war to any of their fellow-citizens of the Union, and if anything could have made them cold and indifferent to their imperiled country, this unnecessary war would have driven them to it.

The war came, and it is now being declared all over the country that there were no better, braver, truer, or more patriotic soldiers in all our Army than the boys who volunteered from the States of the old Confederacy. Some affect great surprise at the loyal devotion to the flag displayed by our people of the Southern States. Many would overwhelm us with thanks for our part in that struggle. There is no need for surprise or thanks, sir.

Every member of this House from the Southern States who could get the opportunity so to do declared on this floor a year ago that in case of war the sons of the men who had built up the civilization of the old South, the sons of the men who had fought under the Stars and Bars from '61 to '65, would be found standing shoulder to shoulder with the sons of the men who during that soul-trying time had defended the Stars and Stripes, all fighting for the honor and glory of that sunburst flag of liberty and light. [Applause.]

Every act of the people of the South, from Appomattox to Santiago, has been a declaration of devotion and a loyal sacrifice to the Union, and nothing but the "blindness of unbelief" has prevented its acknowledgment long ago. Surprise, distrust, and thanks go hand in hand here, Mr. Speaker, and the people of the South neither deserve the one nor expect the other. Georgia but did her duty, as did Massachusetts, as both will always perform it regardless of consequences, once they have determined where duty leads.

I have never been at war with my fellow-citizens, and it brings a feeling akin to pain to hear iterated and reiterated that my fellow-countrymen are now reconciled to me.

I have always been an American, and the bonds which certain well-intentioned gentlemen are continually weaving with which to rebind me to the Union are galling to the flesh. More than half of us have never been unreconciled, and we weary of eternal welcomes to the place we have always known as home. [Applause.] We have never left our father's house, and while the principles for which they fought and the memory of their sacrifices are dear to us still, it is impossible for us to enjoy the hilarious feast and the fatted calf of the prodigal's return. I have no authority to speak for others, Mr. Speaker, but it would seem to me equally if not more difficult for the man who laid down his arms in '65, and with the oath of allegiance fresh from his lips and heart, turned his energies to the rehabilitation of his home and the reestablishment of the Union, to enjoy a prodigal's feast every day in the week and every week in the year, at so many of which he is made to play the part of host and supply the fatted calf as well as the prodigal. [Applause.]

I have heard it charged against a few people in my time that they "didn't know the war was over," but these have always been considered among the ablest exponents of ignorance in Georgia. The intelligent among us have known that the "war was over" for thirty-four years, Mr. Speaker, and we have not recognized sectional hate for almost a generation.

The ambition of the President is a noble one. To live in history as the restorer of peace to long-contending sections, to go down to latest posterity as the destroyer of sectional animosities is a proud eminence fit to stir "fierce ambition in a Cæsar's mind." Far be it from me to question his words or motives. That he earnestly desires the peace for which he so eloquently spoke in Georgia's capital, I shall not question here. I but declare the simple patent truth. There was already peace between the North and South. There was already harmony and fraternal love. Sectional hate was already dead. Neither the testament of bleeding war nor the pomp and glitter of the President's march brought harmony to the people of the Union. If perchance through either the blind were made to see and the deaf to hear the truth which has been clear to all who would see and hear for nearly a quarter of a century, then has great good been accomplished; but it would seem to me that if there are those here and there on either side who are yet unreconciled, then hate—the growth of forty years—is too deeply rooted to yield to the blowing of ram's horns and the shouting of the multitude. [Applause.]

If my neighbor is my friend, we do not daily rush into each other's arms with protestations of eternal friendship and declarations of undying love. Honest friendship needs not such. If we have been enemies in the past and now are friends, we do not discuss our differences or our dead. The first we buried with the honest handshake that closed the chasm. The last are sacred.

The President's march through Georgia was a splendid pageant. Georgians, always loyal and true, vied with each other in extending hospitality to the nation's Chief Executive. "They threw their caps as they would hang them on the horns of the moon, shouting their approbation;" but, Mr. Speaker, the sons who threw their caps in '98 are no more loyal than the fathers were from the day they grounded their arms in '65 and renewed their broken allegiance to the Union. "The holy faith that warmed their sires" inspired the sons in '98. [Loud applause.] Then let us have done with these constantly recurring reconciliations of the sections. [Renewed applause.]

Speaking for myself, the son of a Confederate soldier, and one who loves the memories of the old South, while I thank the President for the honor he would now do our martyred dead, and while I shall not be found blindly opposing the consummation of his purpose, I dare declare the truth—the people of the South do not ask it. The unknown dead which sleep amid the high mountains of Virginia, and in the green valleys of Tennessee and Kentucky, whose graves are washed by the turbulent waters of the Mississippi, and whose last requiem is whispered by the meandering Chickamauga, the rippling Rappahannock, and the historic James, are a heritage of eternal glory to the people of the South.

On fame's eternal camping ground
Their silent tents are spread.

They are ours; they sleep well as they are, and God forbid that their bones should ever be made the football of party politics, to be kicked from side to side of this Chamber as occasion may demand. We accept the words of the President in good faith, Mr. Speaker, but we insist that this shall be the last reconciliation of the sections. Let this be the final ratification of the treaty of peace between the North and South. [Applause.]

Too much harmony palls upon the taste. Too many reconciliations bespeak too many differences.

"The time has come in the evolution of sentiment and feeling, under the providence of God, when in the spirit of fraternity," we should to the last man shake off this horrid nightmare of sectional hate, from whose paralyzing grasp our fitful and hysterical awakenings for twenty-five years have made the angels weep and the nations smile. [Loud applause.]

Let this last march through Georgia end forever the differences of half a century. Let it obliterate all traces of that other march, whose blackened trail marked the close of actual war. Let the hegira of 1861 be forever swallowed up in the pilgrimage of 1898. Let us turn our faces to the morning, you of the North cherishing your memories as we shall ever cherish ours, all pressing forward in unison to a realization of the patriot's hope and the poet's dream of—

Columbia, gem of the ocean,
The home of the brave and the free,
The shrine of each patriot's devotion,
A world offers homage to thee.

[Loud applause.]

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman has expired.

Mr. MARSH. I move that the committee rise and report the bill and amendments to the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The committee accordingly rose; and the Speaker having resumed the chair, Mr. HEPBURN, chairman of the Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union, reported that that committee had had under consideration the bill H. R. 11717, and had directed him to report the same to the House with sundry amendments, and that, as amended, the bill do pass.

The SPEAKER. The question is on agreeing to the amendments.

The question was taken; and the amendments were agreed to.

The bill as amended was ordered to be engrossed for a third reading; and being engrossed, it was accordingly read the third time, and passed.

On motion of Mr. MARSH, a motion to reconsider the vote by which the bill was passed was laid on the table.

RECEPTION OF STATUES OF BENTON AND BLAIR.

The SPEAKER. The Clerk will read the special order.

The Clerk read as follows:
